EXPLANATIONS

REGARDING PRONUNCIATION AND CHEMICAL SYMBOLS

PRONUNCIATION.

IN showing the pronunciation the simplest and most easily understood method has been adopted, that of re-writing the word in a different form. In doing so the same letter or combination of letters is made use of for the same sound, no matter by what letter or letters the sound may be expressed in the principal word. The key by this means is greatly simplified, the reader having only to bear in mind one mark for each sound.

Vowels.

ā, as in fate.	o, as in not.
ā, " far.	ō, " move.
ā, " fat.	ū, " tube.
ā, " fall.	u, " tub.
ē, " me.	ū, " bull.
e, " met.	ū, " Sc. abune (Fr. u).
ē, " her.	oi, " oil.
i, " pine.	ou, " pound.
i, " pin.	y, " Sc. ley (=e+i).
ō, " note.

Consonants.

ch, .. as in .. chain.	th, as in then.
ch, .. " .. Sc. loch, Ger. nacht.	th, " thin.
j, .. " .. job.	w, " wig.
g, .. " .. go.	wh, " whig.
h, .. " .. Fr. ton.	zh, " azure.
ng, .. " .. sing.

The application of this key to the pronunciation of foreign words can as a rule only represent approximately the true pronunciation of those words. It is applicable, however, to Latin and Greek words, as those languages are pronounced in England.

Accent.—Words consisting of more than one syllable receive an accent, as the first syllable of the word labour, the second of delay, and the third of comprehension. The accented syllable is the most prominent part of the word, being made so by means of the accent. In this dictionary it is denoted by the mark '. This mark, called an accent, is placed above and beyond the syllable which receives the accent, as in the words la'bour, de'lay, and comprehen'sion.

Many polysyllabic words are pronounced with two accents, the primary and the secondary accent, as the word excommunication, in which the third, as well as the fifth syllable is commonly accented. The accent on the fifth syllable is the primary, true, or tonic accent, while that on the third is a mere euphonic accent, and consists of a slight resting on the syllable to prevent indistinctness in the utterance of so many unaccented syllables. Where both accents are marked in a word, the primary accent is thus marked ', and the secondary, or inferior one, by this mark ' , as in the word excommu'nica'tion.

CHEMICAL ELEMENTS AND SYMBOLS.

By means of chemical symbols, or formulas, the composition of the most complicated substances can be very easily expressed, and that, too, in a very small compass. An abbreviated expression of this kind often gives, in a single line, more information as to details than could be given in many lines of letterpress.

Elements.	Symbols.	Elements.	Symbols.
Aluminium,	Al	Mercury (Hydrargyrum), .	Hg
Antimony (Stibium), . .	Sb	Molybdenum,	Mo
Arsenic,	As	Nickel,	Ni
Barium,	Ba	Niobium,	Nb
Bismuth,	Bi	Nitrogen,	N
Boron,	B	Osmium,	Os
Bromine,	Br	Oxygen,	O
Cadmium,	Cd	Palladium,	Pd
Cæsium,	Cs	Phosphorus,	P
Calcium,	Ca	Platinum,	Pt
Carbon,	C	Potassium (Kalium), . .	K
Cerium,	Ce	Rhodium,	R
Chlorine,	Cl	Rubidium,	Rb
Chromium,	Cr	Ruthenium,	Ru
Cobalt,	Co	Selenium,	Se
Copper (Cuprum), . . .	Cu	Silicon,	Si
Didymium,	D	Silver (Argentum), . . .	Ag
Erbium,	E	Sodium (Natrium), . . .	Na
Fluorine,	F	Strontium,	Sr
Gallium,	Ga	Sulphur,	S
Glucium,	G	Tantalum,	Ta
Gold (Aurum),	Au	Tellurium,	Te
Hydrogen,	H	Thallium,	Tl
Indium,	In	Thorium,	Th
Iodine,	I	Tin (Stannum),	Sn
Iridium,	Ir	Titanium,	Ti
Iron (Ferrum),	Fe	Tungsten (Wolfram), . .	W

Lead (Plumbum), . . .	Pb	Vanadium,	V
Lithium,	L	Yttrium,	Y
Magnesium,	Mg	Zinc,	Zn
Manganese,	Mn	Zirconium,	Zr

When any of the above symbols stands by itself it indicates one atom of the element it represents. Thus, H stands for one atom of hydrogen, O for one atom of oxygen, and Cl for one atom of chlorine. (See ATOM, and Atomic theory under ATOMIC, in Dictionary.)

When a symbol has a small figure or number underwritten, and to the right of it, such figure or number indicates the number of atoms of the element. Thus—O₂ signifies two atoms of oxygen, S₅ five atoms of sulphur, and C₁₀ ten atoms of carbon.

When two or more elements are united to form a chemical compound, their symbols are written one after the other, to indicate the compound. Thus—H₂O means water, a compound of two atoms of hydrogen and one of oxygen; C₁₂H₂₂O₁₁ indicates cane-sugar, a compound of twelve atoms of carbon, twenty-two of hydrogen, and eleven of oxygen.

These two expressions as they stand denote respectively a molecule of the substance they represent, that is, the smallest possible quantity of it capable of existing in the free state. To express several molecules a large figure is prefixed, thus: 2 H₂O represents two molecules of water, 4 (C₁₂H₂₂O₁₁) four molecules of cane-sugar.

When a compound is formed of two or more compounds the symbolical expressions for the compound are usually connected together by a comma; thus, the crystallized magnesian sulphate is MgSO₄, 7 H₂O. The symbols may also be used to express the changes which occur during chemical action, and they are then written in the form of an equation, of which one side represents the substances as they exist before the change, the other the result of the reaction. Thus, 2 H₂ + O₂ = 2 H₂O expresses the fact that two molecules of hydrogen, each containing two atoms, and one of oxygen, also containing two atoms, combine to give two molecules of water, each of them containing two atoms of hydrogen and one of oxygen.

THE IMPERIAL DICTIONARY

OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

L

L, the twelfth letter of the English alphabet, is usually denominated a semi-vowel or a liquid. It is formed by placing the tip of the tongue against the gum that incloses the roots of the upper teeth, and allowing the breath to escape by the sides of the tongue. L has only one sound in English, as in like, canal. At the end of monosyllables it is often doubled, as in fall, full, tell, bell, but not after diphthongs and digraphs, as foul, fool, prowl, growl, foal, &c. The nearest ally of l is r, the pronunciation of which differs from that of l only in being accompanied by a vibration of the tip of the tongue. There is no letter accordingly with which l is more frequently interchanged, instances of the change of l into r and of r into l being both very common in various languages. In fact in the history of the Indo-European alphabet l is considered to be a later modification of r. Thus the Skr. ruch, to shine, corresponds to the Gr. root luk in leukos, white, L. luc in luceo, to shine, lux, light, and the root of E. light; the L. ulmus yields the Fr. orme, and the L. peregrinus yields the It. pellegrino, Fr. pèlerin, E. pilgrim, L. lavendula, E. lavender. So too the Latin adjectival terminations -alis, -aris are the same. There are whole nations that do not possess one or other of these sounds, the Japanese, for example, always using r instead of l, while the Chinese use l instead of r. L is also found representing n, as in postern, as well as the mutes d, t, thus E. tear, Fr. larme, Gr. dakry, are etymologically of the same origin. In A. Sax. l, like the other liquids n and r, is often preceded by h, which was no doubt sounded, as in hlaf, loaf; hladan, to lade or load; hlót, lot; hléman, hléonian, to lean. In English words the terminating syllable le is unaccented, the e is silent, and l forms itself a syllable, as in able, eagle, pronounced abl, eagl. In some words l is now mute, as in half, calf, walk, talk, chalk, yolk, calm; from others it has disappeared altogether, as from each, such; in hawberk, auburn, it has become u; in could, syllable, participle, it has intruded.—As an abbreviation, in Latin, it stands for Lucius; L.L.S. for a sesterce, or two libre and a half. L.L.D. stands for Legum Doctor, Doctor of Laws. L is also used for liber, book, as applied to a division in a work.—As a numeral L stands for 50.

La (la), exclam. [A. Sax. la, lo! behold!] Look; see; behold.

La (lä). In music, (a) in solmization, the sixth of the seven syllables—ut or do, re, mi, fa, sol, la, si—representing the seven sounds in the diatonic scale. (b) The syllable by which Guido denoted the last sound of each of his hexachords. If the hexachord begins in C, the la answers to our A; if in G, to our E; and if in F, to D.

Lab, Labbe, n. [Allied to D. labben, to blab, to tell tales; to G. labbe, lip, mouth; and probably to E. lab.] A great talker; a blabber. 'I am no lab.' Chaucer. [Obsolete or provincial.]

Lab, Labbe, v. i. [See the noun.] To blab; to prate; to talk thoughtlessly or carelessly. 'A labbing shrew is she.' Chaucer.

Labadist (lab'a-dist), n. A follower of Jean de Labadie, who lived in the seventeenth century. The Labadists held that God can and does deceive men, that the observance of the Sabbath is a matter of indifference, and other peculiar opinions.

Labarri (la-bar'ré), n. Elaps lemniscatus, a deadly snake of Guiana, which sometimes reaches the length of 8 feet. It is beautifully coloured when alive, but fades when dead.

Labarum (lab'a-rum), n. [L. labarum, labörum, Gr. labaron, laböron; etym. doubtful.] The imperial standard adopted by Constantine the Great after his conversion to Christianity, differently described and figured, but generally represented as a pole having a cross-bar with the banner depending from it and bearing the Greek letters XP (that is, Chr), conjoined so as to form a monogram of the name of Christ. The banner was made of silk. The word is sometimes used for any other standard or flag, and its form may still be recognized in the banners carried in ecclesiastical processions.

Labdanum (lab'da-num). See LADANUM.
Labefaction, Labefaction (lab-e-fak'shon, lab'e-fak-tä'shon), n. [L. labefactio, from labefacio—labo, to totter, and facio, to make.] A weakening or loosening; overthrow; decay; downfall; ruin.

There is in it such a labefaction of all principles as may be injurious to morality. Johnson.

Labefy (lab'e-fi), v. t. To weaken or impair.
Label (lä'bl), n. [O. Fr. label, lambel, labeau, a rag, a tatter, a shred: either of Germanic or of Celtic origin; comp. G. lappen, a flap, patch, rag, and W. lab, a strip, labed, a label; Gael. leab, a shred.] 1. A slip of silk, paper, parchment, or other material, containing a name, title, address, or the like, and affixed to anything, indicating its nature, contents, ownership, destination, or other particulars.—2. A narrow slip of parchment or paper, or a ribbon of silk, affixed to diplomas, deeds, or writings to hold the appended seal.—3. Any paper annexed to a will by way of addition, as a codicil.—4. In her. a fillet with pendants or points, a figure usually added to coat armour to mark a distinction in the arms of the eldest son during the life of the father, in which case it has three points. A label of five points is the distinction of the heir whilst the grandfather is living; one of seven points, the difference for the heir in the lifetime of his great-grandfather; and so on. The label is also termed a Lambel, sometimes a Fyle.

5. A long thin brass rule, with a small sight at one end and a centre-hole at the other, commonly used with a tangent line on the edge of a circumferenter, to take altitudes, &c.—8.† A tassel. Fuller.—7. In Goth. arch. a projecting tablet or moulding over doors, windows, &c., called a hood-moulding, and a drip, dripstone, or weather-moulding when it is turned square.—8. A pendant like a broad ribbon hanging from the head-dress and helmet of a knight.

Labarum.—Medal of Constantine.

Label of three points.

LABIATÆ

Label (lä'bl), v. t. pret. & pp. labelled; ppr. labelling. To affix a label to.

It shall be inventoried, and every particle and utensil labelled. Shak.

Labeller (lä'bl-ër), n. One who affixes labels to anything.

Labellum (la-bel'lum), n. [L., a little lip.] A term applied in botany to one of the three pieces forming the corolla in orchideous plants. It is often spurred.

Labent (lä'bent), a. [L. labens, labentis, ppr. of labor, to slide.] Sliding; gliding. [Rare.]

Labia (lä'bi-a), n. pl. [From L. labium, a lip.] In anat. the lips. Applied also to the parts of the pudendum exterior to the nymphæ.

Labial (lä'bi-al), a. [Fr., from L. labium, a lip. See LIP.] 1. Pertaining to the lips. 'A labial gland or vein.' Dunglison.—2. Formed by the lips; owing its special character to the lips; as, a labial articulation, a labial consonant, namely one such as b, p, and m.

Labial (lä'bi-al), n. A letter or character representing a sound or articulation formed or uttered chiefly by the lips, as b, f, m, p, v, are called labials.

Labially (lä'bi-al-ly), adv. In a labial manner; by means of the lips.

Labiata (lä-bi-ä'te), n. pl. [See LABIATE.] The mint tribe, a very important and extensive natural order of exogenous plants, with a labiate corolla, and a four-lobed ovary, changing to four seed-like monospermous fruits. This order contains about 2600 species, mostly herbs, undershrubs, or shrubs, rarely arborescent, with opposite or whorled leaves, usually square stems, and a thyrsoid or whorled inflorescence. They are spread throughout the world, being most strongly represented in the Mediterranean and eastern regions, but abounding in all temperate latitudes. Many of the species are valued for their fragrance, as lavender and thyme; others for their stimulating qualities, as mint and peppermint; others as aromatics, as savory, basil, and marjoram; several are used as febrifuges, as the Ocimum febrifugum of Sierra Leone. Rosemary is used in the manufacture of Hungary-water, and its oil is that which gives the green colour to bear's-grease and such pomatums. Betony, ground-ivy, horehound, and others possess bitter tonic qualities. Numerous species are objects of great beauty, as various kinds of sage, Gardoquia, and Draccephalum. Also called Lamiaceæ.

oil, pound; ü, Sc. abune; y, Sc. fey. w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY

Labiato, Labiated (lā'bi-āt, lā'bi-āt-ed), a. [L. labiatus, from L. labium, lip.] In bot. a term applied to an irregular gamopetalous corolla, the limb or expanded portion cleft so as to present an upper and lower lip, the upper consisting of two, the lower of three segments.

Labiato Corolla.

Labiati (lā'bi-ā-ti), n. pl. [L. labiatus, lipped, from L. labium, a lip, and flos, floris, a flower.] In bot. a section of the nat. order Compositæ. The flowers are mostly hermaphrodite, and the corolla is divided into two lips.

Labile (lā'b'il), a. [L. labilis, apt to slip, from L. labor, to slide, to slip.] Liable to err, fall, or apostatize. [Rare.]

Liability (lā-bi'l-i-ti), a. Liability to lapse or err. Coleridge.

Labimeter, Labidometer (la-bim'et-ér, lab-i-dom'et-ér), n. [Gr. labis, labidos, a forceps, and metron, a measure.] In obstetrics, a scale adapted to the handles of the forceps, which indicates the distance of the blades from each other when applied to the head of the child in the womb.

Labiodental (lā'bi-ō-den-tal), a. [L. labium, a lip, and dens, a tooth.] In phonetics, formed or pronounced by the co-operation of the lips and teeth; as, f and v are labiodental letters.

Labiodental (lā'bi-ō-den-tal), n. A letter representing a sound pronounced by the co-operation of the lips and teeth.

Labio-palpi (lā'bi-pal-pi), n. pl. [L. labium, a lip, and palpium, a feeler.] In entom. the labial feelers in insects.

Labium (lā'bi-um), n. pl. Labia (lā'bi-a), [L., a lip.] A lip or lip-like part; as, (a) the lower lip of insects, the upper being called the labrum. (b) The inner lip of a univalve shell, the outer being called the labrum.

Labor (lā'bor), n. A Mexican land measure, equal to 177 acres. Simmonds.

Laborant (lā'b'o-rant), n. A chemist. I can show you a sort of fix sulphur made by an industrious laborant. Boyle.

Laboratory (lā'b'o-ra-to-ri), n. [L. laboratorium, Fr. laboratoire, from L. labor, labour.] See LABOUR. 1. A building or workshop designed for investigation and experiment in chemistry, physics, pyrotechnics, or the like. —2. A place where work is performed or anything is elaborated or prepared for use; hence, the stomach is called the grand laboratory of the human body; the liver the laboratory of the bile.

Laborious (la-bō'ri-us), a. [L. laboriosus; Fr. laborieux. See LABOUR.] 1. Requiring labour, exertion, or perseverance; toilsome; tiresome; not easy; as, laborious duties or services.

With what compulsion and laborious flight We sunk thus low. Milton.

Dost thou love watchings, abstinence, or toil, Laborious virtues all? Learn these from Cato. Addison.

2. Using exertion; employing labour; diligent in work or service; assiduous; used of persons; as, a laborious husbandman or mechanic; a laborious minister or pastor. 'Laborious for her people and her poor.' Tennyson. —SYN. Industrious, painstaking, active, diligent, assiduous, toilsome, difficult, arduous, wearisome, fatiguing, troublesome, tedious.

Labouring (lā'bér-ing), p. and a. 1. Exerting muscular strength or intellectual power; toiling; moving with pain or difficulty; cultivating. —2. A term applied to a person who performs work that requires no apprenticeship or professional skill, in distinction from an artisan. —3. Devoted or set apart for labour; as, a labouring day. —Labouring force, the force applied to a machine to set and keep it in motion. It differs from working or efficient force, which is the force actually exerted by the machine, or the force transmitted to the point of effect, inasmuch as part of it is expended in overcoming friction, &c. The labouring force is thus always greater than the working force.

Labourless (lā'bér-less), a. Without labour; not laborious; easily done.

Labour-pains (lā'bér-pānz), n. pl. Pains of childbirth.

Labour-saving (lā'bér-sāv-ing), a. Saving labour; adapted to supersede or diminish the labour of men; as, a labour-saving machine.

Labyrinthodon Salamandroides.—Professor Owen.

Africa. They were allied to the crocodile and to the frog, and were 10 or 12 feet long. The name is derived from the labyrinthine structure of a section of the tooth, when seen under the microscope. The cheirotherium is supposed to have been the same animal.

Labyrinthodont (lab-i-rinth'ô-dont), n. A member of the order of Labyrinthodontia.

Labyrinthodontia (lab-i-rinth'ô-dont'shi-a), n. pl. [See LABYRINTHODON.] An order of fossil Amphibia, of which Labyrinthodon is the type genus. See LABYRINTHODON.

Lac (lak), n. [Per. lak, a red dye; Skr. lakshā and rakshā, the lac insect, from ranj, to dye.] A resinous substance produced mainly upon the Ficus indica or banyan-tree, by the exudations from the body of the female of the Coccus ficus or Coccus lacca. It is composed of five different varieties of resin, with a small quantity of several other substances, particularly a red colouring matter. Stick-lac is the substance in its natural state, incrusting small twigs. When broken off and washed with water it almost entirely loses its red colour, and is called seed-lac, from its granular form. When melted and reduced to a thin crust, it is called shell-lac. Mixed with turpentine, colouring matters, and other substances, lac is used to make differently coloured sealing-wax. Dissolved in alcohol or other menstrua, by different methods of preparation, it constitutes various kinds of varnishes and lacquers.—Lac-dye and lac-lake are colouring matters used in dyeing cloth scarlet, obtained by different processes from stick-lac. In the state in which they are found in commerce they have the form of little cakes. They were formerly obtained only from the East, but a superior kind of lac-dye is now manufactured in England from stick-lac. The colouring matter of lac-dye is analogous to cochineal.

Lac, Lack (lak), n. [Hind. lakh, lakh; Skr. laksha, a hundred thousand.] In the East Indies, a word used to denote 100,000; as, a lac of rupees.

Lactic (lak'tik), a. [L. lac, lactis, milk. Fr. lactique.] Pertaining to milk or procured from sour milk or whey.—Lactic acid (C₂H₃O₃), an acid found in several animal liquids, and particularly in human urine. It is not only formed in milk when it becomes sour, but also in the fermentation of several vegetable juices, and in the putrefaction of some animal matters. The acid which is found in the fermented juice of beet-root, turnips, and carrots, in sour-kraut, in fermented rice-water, in the fermented extract of nux vomica, and in the infusion of bark used by tanners, is for the most part pure lactic acid. It is a colourless, inodorous, very sour liquid, of a syrupy consistence. It coagulates milk.

Lactide (lak'tid), n. ($C_3H_4O_5$). A volatile substance, one of the products of the dry distillation of lactic acid. See LACTONE.

Lactiferous (lak-tif'er-us), a. [L. lac, milk, and fero, to bear.] 1. Bearing or conveying milk or white juice; as, a lactiferous duct. 2. Producing a thick white or coloured juice, as a plant.

Lactific, Lactifical (lak-tif'ik, lak-tif'ik-al), a. [L. lac, lactis, milk, and facio, to make.] Causing, producing, or yielding milk.

Lactifuge (lak'ti-fūj), n. [L. lac, lactis, milk, and fugo, to expel.] A medicine which checks or diminishes the secretion of milk in the breast.

Lactine, Lactose (lak'tin, lak'tōs), n. [Fr. lactine, from L. lac, milk.] Sugar of milk ($C_{12}H_{22}O_{11}$), a substance obtained by evaporating whey, filtering through animal charcoal, and crystallizing. It forms hard, white, semi-transparent trimetric crystals, which have a slightly sweet taste, and grate between the teeth. It is convertible like starch into glucose by boiling with very dilute sulphuric acid. Nitric acid converts it into malic, oxalic, and mucic or saccharic acid.

Lacto-butyrometer (lak'tō-bū-ti-rom'et-ēr), n. [L. lac, milk, Gr. butyron, butter, and metron, measure.] A kind of lactometer for ascertaining the quantity of butyry matter any particular milk contains.

Lacto-densimeter (lak'tō-den-sim'et-ēr), n. [L. lac, milk, densus, dense, and Gr. metron, measure.] A kind of hydrometer for finding the density of milk, and thus discovering whether it has been mixed with water.

Lactometer (lak-tom'et-ēr), n. [L. lac, milk, and Gr. metron, a measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the different qualities of milk. Several instruments of this sort have been invented. One consists of a glass tube 1 foot long, graduated into 100 parts. New milk is filled into it and allowed to stand until the cream has fully separated, when its relative quantity is shown by the number of parts in the 100 which it occupies. Called also Galactometer.

Lactone (lak'tōn), n. ($C_3H_4O_5$). A colourless volatile liquid, possessing an aromatic smell, produced, along with lactide, by the dry distillation of lactic acid.

Lactory (lak'tō-ri), a. Lactiferous; lactary.

Lactoscope (lak'tō-skōp), n. [L. lac, lactis, milk, and Gr. skōpeō, to see.] An instrument for estimating the quantity of cream in milk by ascertaining its opacity.

Lactose. See LACTINE.

Lactuca (lak-tū'ka), n. [L.] A genus of plants, nat. order Compositae, sub-order Cichoraceae. It includes about sixty species of annual and biennial herbs, many of which are eminently useful as salad and culinary plants. They are smooth (rarely hispid) plants abounding in milky juice, of erect habit, having entire or pinnate leaves, and yellow or blue flowers in paniculate heads, and are chiefly natives of Europe, Asia, Africa, and the northern parts of America. Many varieties are cultivated in our gardens, and all of these are divided into two groups: cabbage-lettuces, with round depressed or spreading cabbage-like heads, and cos-lettuces (which take their name from the island of Cos, in the Grecian Archipelago), growing erect and oblong. Four species are found wild in Britain. The milky juice of the different species is usually bitter, astringent, and narcotic, especially in L. virosa. L. sativa (garden-lettuce) is one of the principal kinds of vegetables used for salads. See LACTUCARIUM.

Lactucarium (lak-tū-kā'ri-um), n. [From L. lactuca, lettuce, from lac, lactis, milk.] The inspissated milky juice of Lactuca sativa or garden-lettuce, and also of L. virosa, L. scariola, and L. altissima. It possesses slight anodyne properties, and is sometimes used as a substitute for opium.

Lactucle (lak-tū'sik), a. Pertaining to plants of the genus Lactuca.

Lactumen (lak-tū'men), n. [L., from lac, milk: so named from the white colour of the pustules.] In med. the milk-scab, which affects children at the breast.

Lacuna (la-kū'na), n. pl. Lacunæ (la-kū'nē). [L., a hollow.] 1. A pit or depression; a small blank space; a gap; a hiatus.—2. In bot. (a) one of the small hollows or pits on the upper surface of the thallus of lichens. (b) A name given occasionally to the internal organ, commonly called an air-cell, lying in the midst of the cellular tissue of plants.—3. In anat. one of a multitude of follicles in the mucous membranes, as in those of the urethra.—4. In physiol. one of the spaces left among the tissues of the lower animals which serve in place of vessels for the circulation of the fluids of the body.

Lacunal (la-kū'n'al), a. Pertaining to or having lacunæ.

Lacunar (la-kū'n'ar), n. pl. Lacunars, Lacunaria (la-kū'n'ar, la-kū'nā'ri-a). [L.] In arch. (a) the ceiling or under surface of the member of an order, of the corona of a cornice, or of the part of the architrave between the capitals of columns, and generally any ceiling having sunk or hollowed compartments without spaces or bands between the panels; a laquear having bands between the panels. (b) One of the coffers or sunk compartments in ceilings or the soffits of cornices.

Lacunar (la-kū'n'ar), a. Pertaining to or having lacunæ or lacunars; characterized by open spaces at intervals.

Lacunaria, n. pl. See LACUNAR, n.

Lacunette (la-kū-net'), n. In fort. a small fosse or ditch.

Lacunoso-rugose (la-kū'n'sō-rū-gōs'), a. [L. lacuna, a pit, anything hollow, and rugosus, a wrinkle.] In bot. marked by deep, broad, irregular wrinkles, as the shell of the walnut or stone of the peach.

Lacunous, Lacunose (la-kū'n'us, la-kū'n'ōs), a. [L. lacunus, from lacuna, a pit or hollow.] Furrowed or pitted; having a few scattered, irregular, broadish, but shallow excavations, as a surface; as, a lacunose leaf has the disc depressed between the veins.

Lacustral (la-kus'tral), a. Same as Lacustrine.

Lacustrine (la-kus'trin), a. [L. lacus, a lake.] Pertaining to a lake.—Lacustrine deposits, deposits formed at the bottom of lakes, which frequently consist of a series of strata disposed with great regularity one built on small islands in lakes, or on platforms supported by piles near the shores of lakes. Herodotus describes certain dwellings of this kind on Lake Prasias in Thrace as being approached by a narrow bridge, each habitation having a trap-door in the floor, giving access to the water beneath, through which fish were caught. The remains of a great number of such dwellings, some of them belonging to prehistoric times, have been met with in Europe, among the first having been discovered in 1839 in the small lake of Lagore, in the county of Meath, Ireland, in which country they are styled crannogs or crannoges. Similar remains have since been discovered in lakes in Scotland, Switzerland, and elsewhere, the level of the lakes often having risen since the dwellings were inhabited. Dwellings not dissimilar are still constructed by the natives of Borneo, New Guinea, and other countries.

Lad, Ladde, pret. of lede. Led; carried. Charwer; Spenser.

Lad (lad), n. [Of doubtful origin. In O.E. laddē is generally used of a man of inferior station. Perhaps modified by influence of ladder, led (as if one who is led), from O.E. lade, a man, A. Sax. ledd, ledda, a man, a countryman; leddan, Goth. liudan, to grow. The W. llawd, a lad, is by some regarded as the original. Lass, supposed to be a contraction of lades, or of W. lodes, a girl, is the feminine corresponding to lad.] 1. A young man or boy; a stripling.—2. Fellow; comrade: often used in addressing men of any age.

How now, old lad!

Shak.

3. A male sweetheart. [Scotch.]

Ladanum (lad'a-num), n. [L.; Gr. ladanon, the resinous juice of a shrub lada, from Per. ladan, the shrub.] The resinous juice which exudes from the Cistus ladaniferus, a cistaceous shrub which grows in Spain and Portugal, and from C. creticus, which grows in Crete, Syria, &c. It is collected with a kind of rake, with leather thongs attached to it, with which the shrubs are brushed. The best sort is in dark-coloured or black masses, of the consistence of a soft plaster. The other sort is in long rolls coiled up, harder than the former, and of a paler colour. It was chiefly used in external applications, but is now in little request. Also called Labdanum.

Ladanum-bush (lad'a-num-bush), n. A name of the species of Cistus which yield ladanum.

Ladder (lad'der), n. [A. Sax. hlædder; cog. O. Fris. hladder, D. ladder, O.H.G. hleitra, hleitra, Mod. G. leiter, a ladder. The initial guttural is radical, and the word is connected by Grimm with L. clathri, a trellis or grate, Goth. hleithra, a tent or hut of wattles; by some it is ascribed to same root as Gr. klimax, a ladder, klinein, to bend.] 1. A frame of wood, metal, or rope, consisting of two side-pieces connected by rounds or rungs inserted in them at suitable distances, and thus forming steps by which persons may ascend a building, &c.—2. Fig. any means of ascending; a means of rising to eminence. 'Mounting fast towards the top of the ladder ecclesiastical.' Swift.—Accommodation ladder. See under Accommodation.—Companion ladder. See under Companion.

A utensil shaped like a dish, with a handle, generally a comparatively long handle, used for lifting or serving out liquids from a vessel.—2. The receptacle of a mill-wheel which receives the water that moves it.—3. In gun, an instrument for drawing the charge of a cannon.—4. In founding, an iron vessel, often with two handles, in which liquid metal is carried from the furnace to the mould.

Ladle (lād'l), v.t. To lift or deal out with a ladle; to lade.

Daly's business was to ladle out the punch.
T. Hook.

Ladleful (lād'l-ful), n. The quantity contained in a ladle.

Ladron† (lā-drōn'), n. [Sp. ladrone, from L. latro, latronis, a robber.] A thief; a robber; a highwayman; a rogue.

Lady (lā'di), n. [A. Sax. hlæfdige, late A. Sax. hlæfde, lit. bread-maid, from hlæf, hlāf, bread, loaf, and dige, O.E. and Sc. dey, servant-maid. (See DAIRY.) Others derive the word as if from hlæfweardige, from hlæf, and weardian, to ward or look after, and this origin would make it a more natural feminine to lord, the latter being derived from hlæfweard. See LORD.] 1. A woman of distinction, correlative to lord; the proper title of any woman whose husband is above the rank of a baronet or knight, or who is the daughter of a nobleman not lower than an earl, though often the wife of a baronet or a knight is called by this title.—2. A term applied by courtesy to any woman; one of the fair sex; specifically, a woman of good breeding, education, and refinement of mind: the correlative to gentleman.—3. A wife; a spouse.

Lamaism (lā'mā-izm), n. A variety of Buddhism, chiefly prevailing in Tibet and Mongolia: so called from the lamas or priests belonging to it. The highest object of worship is Buddha, who is regarded as the founder of the religion, and the first in rank among the saints. The other saints comprise all those recognized in Buddhism, besides hosts of religious teachers and pious men canonized after their death. The clergy are the representatives or re-incarnations of these saints on earth, and receive the homage due to them. Besides these saints a number of inferior gods or spirits are recognized by Lamaism and receive a certain worship. The Lamaists have a hierarchy in some respects resembling that of the Roman Catholic Church, and they have also monasteries and nunneries, auricular confession, litanies, &c., and believe in the intercession of the saints and in the saying of masses for the dead. In the hierarchy there are two supreme heads, the dalai-lama and the tesho-lama. See DALAI-LAMA.

Lamellibranchiata (la-mel'li-brang'ki-ä'ta), n. pl. [L. lamella, a thin plate, and branchia, gills.] The name given by De Blainville to the fifth order of molluscs (the Conchifera of Lamarck), of which mussels, cockles, and oysters are familiar examples. The animals are protected by a lateral bivalve shell, the two valves of which articulate over the back, and are opened by an elastic ligament and closed by one or two adductor muscles. The shell is secreted by a prolongation of the integument called the mantle or pallium, which laps round the body, its halves being either free or united so as to leave only three apertures for the inlet and outlet of water for respiration, and for the protrusion of a fleshy organ called the foot, when it is present. The muscular edge of the mantle leaves on each valve an impression called the pallial line. Respiration is effected by two pairs of lamellated gills (whence the name), occupying a large portion of the interior of the shell on each side. The mouth is a simple jawless fissure, furnished with one or two pairs of soft palpi, the food being conveyed to it by cilia on the gills. The heart has a single ventricle pierced by the intestine, and there are three double nerve-centres.

Lamellibranchiate (la-mel'li-brang'ki-ä'ta), a. Relating to the Lamellibranchiata.

See TONGUE.] 1. Human speech; the expression of thoughts by words or articulate sounds; as, language is the peculiar possession of man.—2. A particular set of articulate sounds used in the expression of thoughts; the aggregate of the words employed by any community for intercommunication; as, the English language; the Greek language.—Philologists have classified the languages of the earth on two principles; first, according to the structure of the language or the manner in which its sounds are formed or combined; and, secondly, according to their genetic connection or relationship as to origin. The first kind of classification is called the morphological, the second the genealogical. According to the morphological classification three forms of structure in languages are usually distinguished—the isolating, the agglutinating, and the inflectional. The isolating languages, of which the Chinese is an example, are composed entirely of monosyllabic unchangeable roots, which may indeed be compounded with one another in order to express their mutual relations, but as a rule retain their independence. The agglutinating languages are such as possess certain unalterable roots to which other syllables, which are capable of modification, and which do not retain an independent signification, are affixed to express relations. Of this class are the Mongolic or Turanian languages. A subdivision of this class consists of those languages, such as the American, which attach all the subordinate or less important members of a sentence to the main root as terminations, and which are called the incorporating. The inflectional languages, which are the most highly developed, are those in which all the roots are capable of being modified to express different relations or shades of meaning. Philologists believe that all languages which have reached this highest stage must previously have passed through the other two stages. When classified genealogically languages are divided into families or groups in which a community of origin is distinctly traceable. Such are the Aryan or Indo-European family (comprising Sanskrit, Persian, Slavonic, Greek, Latin, Gothic, &c.), and the Semitic family (comprising Hebrew, Arabic, Aramaic, &c.), which are the only two families which have reached the inflectional stage of morphological development. 3. Words or expressions appropriate to or especially employed in any branch of knowledge; as, the language of chemistry.—4. Style; manner of expression, either by speech or writing.

Others for language all their care express. Pope.

5. The inarticulate sounds by which irrational animals express their feelings and wants.—6. The expression of thought in any way articulate or inarticulate, conventional or unconventional; as, the language of signs; the language of the eyes; the language of flowers, &c.

The language of the eyes frequently supplies the place of that of the tongue. Crabb.

The original meaning of the name is doubtful; the Icel. lævirkki would literally mean craft-worker, from læ, craft (comp. A. Sax. lewa, a traitor), and virkki, a worker; or the [a] of the name may be the same as E. lay or lea, meadow.] An insectorial bird of the genus Alauda, family Alaudidæ. The true larks are characterized by a long straight hind claw, almost destitute of the power of prehension, a strong bill, and by being able to raise the feathers on the back part of the head into the form of a crest. They are mostly migratory, and build on the ground. There are various species, as the sky-lark (A. arvensis), the wood-lark (A. arborea), the shore-lark (A. alpestris), the crested lark (A. cristata), &c. Of all these the sky-lark, lark, or laverock, so much celebrated for its song, is the best known. The lark is universally diffused over Europe. The female forms her nest on the ground, and lays four or five eggs of a dirty white colour spotted with brown, and she generally brings out two broods in the year. The flesh of the lark is considered a delicacy. Birds of other genera have also the name of lark, as the tit-lark (Anthus pratensis), the tree tit-lark (Anthus arboreus), &c.—To dare larks. See under DARE.

Laryngoscope (la-rin-g'o-skōp), n. [Gr. larynx, laryngos, the larynx, and skōpō, to see.] A contrivance for examining the larynx and commencement of the trachea. It consists of a plane mirror introduced into the mouth, and placed at such an angle that the light thrown on it from a concave reflector, in the centre of which is an aperture, is made to illuminate the larynx, the image of which is again reflected through the aperture in the reflector to the eye of the observer.

Laryngoscopic (la-rin-g'o-skop'ik), a. Pertaining to the inspection of the larynx.

Laryngotomy (la-rin-got'o-mī), n. [Larynx, and Gr. temnō, to cut.] The making of an incision into the larynx for assisting respiration when obstructed, for removing foreign bodies, or for other reasons.

Larynx (lär'ingks), n. [Gr.] In anat. the upper part of the windpipe or trachea, a cartilaginous cavity which plays an important part in the utterance of articulate sounds.

Larynx internally (1) and externally (2).

Its various parts, anatomically considered, are extremely complex and intricate. Fig. 1 above shows A the larynx internally, B being the epiglottis situated above the glottis or entrance to the larynx, C the trachea, and D the œsophagus or gullet. In fig. 2 C is the trachea, D the hyoid bone, EE the thyro-hyoid membrane, F the thyro-hyoid ligament, G the thyro-cric ligament, H the cricoid cartilage, P the crico-thyroid ligament. The sensibility of the larynx is very acute, and is immediately excited by the contact of any foreign substance or of a deleterious gas, whereupon the glottis is firmly closed by special muscles, to prevent the entrance of the noxious body into the lungs. The same action occurs as we swallow our food.

Latitude (lat'i-tūd), n. [Fr.: L. latitudo, from latus, broad, wide. See extract under 4.] 1. Extent from side to side, or distance sideways from a given point or line; breadth; width.

Provided the length do not exceed the latitude. Wotton.

2. Room; space; as, here there was little latitude for motion.—3. In astron. the distance of a star north or south of the ecliptic, measured on that secondary to the ecliptic which passes through the body. Secondaries to the ecliptic are called circles of celestial latitude, and parallels to the ecliptic are called parallels of celestial latitude.—4. In geog. the distance of any place on the globe north or south of the equator, measured on its meridian; any distance measured on a meridian; as, the ship sailed through 30° of latitude. It is called north or south according as the place is on the north or south side of the equator. The highest or greatest latitude is 90°, that is, at the poles. The latitude of a place is easily found, as, for instance, by measuring the altitude of the pole-star. See LONGITUDE.

The ancients supposed the torrid and the frigid zones to be uninhabitable and even impenetrable by man, but while the earth, as known to them, was bounded westward by the Atlantic Ocean, it extended indefinitely towards the east. The dimensions of the habitable world, then (and ancient geography embraced only the home of man, the oikouménē), were much greater measured from west to east than called the greater dimension, or the east and west line, the length, longitude, of the earth, the shorter dimension, or the north and south line, they denominated its breadth, latitude. G. P. Marsh.

5. Extent of meaning; wideness, comprehensiveness, or looseness of application; as, the words will not bear this latitude of construction.

Then, in comes the benign latitude of the doctrine of good-will, and cuts asunder all those hard pinching cords. South.

Laughter (lāf'tér), n. [A. Sax. hleahtor; comp. Icel. hlátr, O. H. G. hlahtar. See LAUGH.]

An expression of mirth, manifested chiefly in certain convulsive and partly involuntary actions of the muscles of respiration, by means of which the air, being expelled from the chest in a series of jerks, produces a succession of short abrupt sounds, certain movements of the muscles of the face, and often of other parts of the body also taking place; also, any expression of merriment perceptible in the countenance, as in the eyes. Laughter is generally excited by things which are of a ridiculous or ludicrous nature, the ultimate cause being usually attributed to the perception of some incongruity, though mere incongruity is not always sufficient. It may also be caused, especially in the young, by tickling; it also accompanies hysteria, and sometimes extreme grief.

Laughterless (lāf'tér-les), a. Without laughter; not laughing.

Laugh-worthy (lāf-wér-thi), a. Deserving to be laughed at; laughable.

They laugh'd at his laugh-worthy fate. B. Jonson.

Lauderer (lān'dér-ér), n. [See LAUNDER.]

A man who follows the business of washing clothes.

Laudress (lān'dres), n. [Fem. form from lavander (which see).] A female whose employment is to wash and dress clothes; a washerwoman.

Laudress (lān'dres), v.i. [From the noun.] To practise washing.

Laudry (lān'dri), n. [Contr. for lavandery. See LAUNDER, n.] 1. The act of washing; a washing. Bacon.—2. The place or room where clothes are washed and dressed.—3. A launder or laundress. [Intentionally erroneous form.]

There dwells one Mistress Quickly, which is in the manner of his nurse, or his dry nurse, or his cook, or his laundry.

Laudry-maid (lān'dri-mād), n. A female servant who attends the laundry.

Laura (lā'ra), n. [Gr. laura, an alley, lane, cloister; hence, a hermitage, a monastery.] Formerly, and especially in the Levant, a collection of cells or hermitages separated from each other, where the monks did not live in community, but each provided for himself, all being at the same time under one superior.

Lauraceæ (lā-rā'sē-ē), n. pl. [L. laurus, a laurel.] A natural order of apetalous exogens, consisting entirely of trees and shrubs, inhabiting the warmer parts of the world, and in most cases aromatic. They have insignificant flowers; the perianth is deeply cleft, four to ten lobed; the stamens are definite, and the fruit (a berry or drupe) is indehiscent; the two or four celled anthers open by recurved valves. Cinnamon, cassia, saffra, and camphor are products of the order. The best known species is the Laurus nobilis, or sweet-bay.

Laureate (lɑ're-āt), a. [L. laureatus, from laurea, a laurel.] Decked or invested with laurel. 'Laureate hearse,' Milton.

Soft on her lap her laureate son reclines. Pope.
—Poet laureate, (a.) in the English universities, one who received an honourable degree at a university for grammar, including poetry and rhetoric, so called from his being crowned with laurel. (b.) In Great Britain, an officer belonging in virtue of his office to the royal household who was formerly required to compose an ode annually for the sovereign's birthday, for a great national victory, and the like—a requirement discontinued since the reign of George III., the post being now a sinecure. A tierce of canary was formerly part of the emoluments, but this has been changed to a money payment.

Laureate (lɑ're-āt), n. One crowned with laurel; a poet laureate.

Alas! few verses touch their nicer ear,
They scarce can hear their laureate twice a year. Pope.

Laureate (lɑ're-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. laureated; ppr. laureating. 1. To honour with a degree in the university, and a wreath of laurel.—2. To invest with the office of poet laureate. Pope.

Laureateship (lɑ're-āt-ship), n. Office of a laureate; the post of a poet laureate.

Laureation (lɑ're-ā'shon), n. The act of crowning with laurel; the act of conferring a degree in a university, together with a wreath of laurel—an honour formerly conferred for excellence in poetry and rhetoric.

On which occasions (i.e. taking degrees in grammar) a wreath of laurel was presented to the new graduate, who was afterwards usually styled 'poeta laureatus.' These laureations, however, seem to have given rise to the appellation in question.

Laurel (lɑ'rel), n. [O.E. laurer; lorer, Fr. laurier, Sp. Fr. laurel, L. laurus.] 1. A plant belonging to the genus Laurus, nat. order Lauraceæ, to which it gives the name. The genus is distinguished by the leaves, which have a single midrib, and by the twelve stamens, all of which are fertile, with two-celled anthers, and two glands, one at each side. The sweet-bay or laurel (Laurus nobilis of Linn.) is a native of the north of Africa

Sweet-bay (Laurus nobilis).

Europe, and is cultivated in our gardens not only on account of its elegant appearance, but also for the aromatic fragrance of its evergreen leaves. The fruit, which is of a purple colour, and also the leaves, have long been used in medicine as stimulants and carminatives. The common or cherry laurel is Prunus laurocerasus, the spurge-laurel the Daphne Laureola. In ancient times, heroes and scholars were crowned with bay leaves and berries, whence the terms baccalaureus and laureate. Hence 2. (pl.) A crown of laurel; and figuratively honour; fame; distinction; as, to win laurels on the field of battle.—3. A gold coin of the reign of James I., struck in 1619, so called from the head of the king being crowned with laurel. See UNITE.

Laurin, Laurine (lɑ-rin), n. (C₂₀H₃₀O₉.) An acrid, fatty, and bitter principle contained in the berries of the laurel.

Laurus (lɑ-rus), n. [L.] A genus of plants, of which the bay-laurel is the type. See LAUREL.

Laurustine, Laurustinus (lɑ-rus-tin, lɑ-rus-tī-nus), n. [L. laurus, laurel, tinus, this plant.] A plant, Viburnum Tinus, an evergreen shrub or tree of the South of Europe.

Lautu (lɑ-tū), n. [Peruv. lautu.] A band of cotton twisted and worn on the head of the Inca of Peru as a badge of royalty.

Lava (lɑ-vā), n. [It. from L. lavo, to wash.] The general term for all rock-matter that flows in a molten state from volcanoes, and which when cooled down forms varieties of tufa, trachyte, trachytic greenstone, and basalt, according to the varying proportions of felspar, hornblende, augite, &c., which enter into the composition of the mass, and according to the slowness or rapidity with which it has cooled. The more rapidly this process of cooling goes on the more compact is the rock.—Lava beds are of two kinds, namely, contemporaneous and intrusive. A contemporaneous lava bed is one which has been poured out over the surface of one deposit, and covered by subsequent deposits. Such a bed is in its natural position, and usually alters only the bed beneath it. The toad-stone associated with the limestone strata of Derbyshire is an example of contemporaneous lava. Intrusive beds are those which have been forced up in a molten state through or between strata, altering those on both sides. The sheets of dolerite occurring on Arthur's Seat, Edinburgh, are examples of intrusive lava beds.—Lava millstone, a hard and coarse basaltic millstone, obtained from quarries near Andernach on the Rhine.

Simmonds.—Lava ware, a kind of coarse ware resembling lava made from iron slag, cast into urns, tiles, table-tops, &c.

Lavandula (lɑ-van'dū-lā), n. [See LAVENDER.] A genus of perennial undershrubs and herbs, belonging to the nat. order Labiata, natives of dry hilly places in the Mediterranean region, the Canary Islands, Madeira, &c. There are about twenty species, with entire or pinnatifid leaves, and long simple (or branched at the base) spikes of blue or violet nearly regular flowers, which are sometimes topped by large coloured bracts, as in L. stoechas. L. spica furnishes oil of spike, which, together with an oil from L. stoechas, is employed by painters on porcelain and in the preparation of varnishes for artists. L. vera, the lavender of commerce, furnishes oil of lavender. Lavender is tonic, stimulant, and carminative.

Lavender (Lavandula spica).

Lavaret (lɑ-vā-ret), n. [Fr.] A fish of the salmon kind, the gwyniad, Coregonus Pennantii (C. lavaretus, Linn.).

Lavatera (lɑ-vā-tērā), n. [Named by De Tournefort in honour of his friends the two Lavaters, famous physicians and naturalists of Zurich.] A genus containing about eighteen species of trees, shrubs, and annual and perennial herbs, natives of the temperate parts of the Old World and Australia, and belonging to the nat. order Malvaceæ. It is readily distinguished from Malva by the three to six bracteoles, which are united at the base, forming an epicalyx. The species are tomentose or hairy plants, with lobed or angular leaves and often showy flowers, which are axillary and solitary or in terminal racemes. L. arborea, or sea-tree-mallow, is a native of Britain, and grows on rocks near the sea.

Lavatic (lɑ-vatik), a. Consisting of or resembling lava; lavic.

Lavation (lɑ-vā'shon), n. [L. lavatio, from lavo.] A washing or cleansing. Hakewill.

Lavatory (lɑ-vā-tō-ri), a. Washing or cleansing by washing.

Lavature (lɑ-vā-tūr), n. A wash or lotion. Holland.

Lave (lāv), v.t. pret. & pp. laved; ppr. laving. [Fr. laver, L. lavo, to wash, to bathe; akin to Gr. louō, to wash.] To wash; to bathe. 'To lave her dainty hands.' Shak. 'Whose walls the silent waters lave.' Parnell.

Lave (lāv), v.i. 1. To wash one's self; to bathe.

Ever since I heedlessly did lave
In thy deceitful stream. Keats.

2. To wash, as the sea, on the beach or at the base of a rock.

These waters blue that round you lave. Byron.

Lave (lāv), v.t. [A. Sax. lafan, to sprinkle water, allied to L. lavo, to wash, and probably to Ice. laug, a bath.] 1. To throw up or out, as water from any receptacle; to lade out; to bale.

A fourth with labour laves
The intruding seas, and waves ejects on waves. Dryden.

2. To pour; also to flow.

Lave (lāv), n. [A. Sax. laf, the remainder, from lafan, to leave.] The remainder; the rest; others. [Scotch.]

Law (lă), n. [A Sax. lagu, from same root as lie and lay (see LAY, LIE); cog. Sw. lag, Icel. lag, lög, Dan. lov, a law. The same root is also in L. lex, a law. (See also LOW.) The word corresponds in radical meaning to Gr. gesetz, law, from setzen, to place; Gr. thesmos, from root of tithēmi, to place, and L. statutum, a statute.] 1. A rule of action or conduct laid down by authority or recognized among men by mutual consent; an edict or decree of a ruler or a government.

Our human laws are but the copies, more or less imperfect, of the eternal laws so far as we can read them, and either succeed and promote our welfare, or fail and bring confusion and disaster, according as the legislator's insight has detected the true principle, or has been distorted by ignorance or selfishness.

J. A. Froude.

2. In a collective sense, the appointed rules of a community or state for the control of its inhabitants, whether formally enacted by statute or not; as, to break the law; to act contrary to law; a father-in-law.

I know, my lord,

3. One of the rules or principles by which anything is regulated; as, the laws of the turf; the laws of versification. — 4. The proposition which expresses the constant or regular order according to which an energy or agent operates; the proposition expressive of the uniform methods or relations according to which material and mental forces act in producing effects, or are manifested in phenomena; a theoretical principle deduced from practice or observation; as, the law of gravitation; a geological law; the laws of physical descent; the law of self-preservation. — 5. In math. a rule according to which anything, as the change of value of a variable, or the value of the terms of a series, proceeds; mode of sequence. — 6. In theol. a term variously used. In the Bible it often includes the whole of revelation, doctrinal as well as preceptive; but it is often also used, in a more restricted sense, to signify the books of Moses, the whole Jewish scriptures being comprehended under the designation 'the law and the prophets.' A very common use of the term is to denote the preceptive part of revelation in contradistinction to the doctrinal, the one part being called the law, and the other the gospel. When employed in Scripture with exclusive reference to the preceptive part of revelation, the term law sometimes signifies the Jewish code of precepts as to rites and ceremonies, called the ceremonial law, and which is regarded as having been abrogated when the Jewish dispensation gave place to the Christian. — 7. Legal procedure for judicial decision of a dispute; the adoption of the steps necessary to bring a disputed point before a tribunal for decision; litigation; as, to go to law.

2. To contrive; to form a scheme. [Rare.] Scarce are their consorts cold, ere they are laying for a second match. Bp. Hall.

3. In betting, to wager; to bet; to stake money on; as, to lay on Sunbeam. —To lay about one, to strike on all sides; to act with vigour. —To lay at, † to strike or to endeavour to strike.

The sword of him that layeth at him cannot hold. Job xli. 26.

—To lay in for, to make overtures for; to engage or secure the possession of.

I have laid in for these. Dryden.

—To lay on, (a) to strike; to beat; to deal blows incessantly and with vehemence. (b) To act with vehemence. —To lay out, (a) to purpose; to intend; as, he lays out to make a journey. (b) To take measures.

I made strict inquiry wherever I came, and laid out for intelligence of all places. Woodward.

—To lay upon, † to importune. [To lay is sometimes used, even by good writers, for to lie, but probably no person would venture to defend this usage. See under LIE.]

Lay (lā), n. 1. That which lies or is laid; a row; a stratum; a layer; one rank in a series reckoned upward; as, a lay of wood.

A viol should have a lay of wire-strings below.

Different lays of black and white marble. Addison.

2. A bet; a wager; an obligation.

They bound themselves by a sacred lay and oath. Holland.

My fortunes against any lay worth naming, this crack of your love shall grow stronger than it was before. Shak.

3. † Station; rank. Welcome unto thee, renowned Turk, Not for thy lay, but for thy worth in arms. Soliman and Perseda (1599).

4. The direction or lie in which the different strands of a rope are twisted. —5. Share of profit; specifically, the proportion of the proceeds of a whaling voyage, generally bargained for by the men when engaging; as, he agreed for four pounds a month and a certain lay. [United States.]

Lay (lā), n. [See LEA.] A meadow; a lea.

A tuft of daisies on a flowery lay. Dryden.

Lay (lā), n. [O. Fr. lai, lais, Fr. lay, lais, a song, a piece of poetry, from the Celtic. Comp. W. lais, a sound, note, tone, voice; Gael. laoidh, laoi, a verse, hymn, sacred poem; the same root appears to be found in A. Sax. leoth, Icel. lyóth, O. H. G. liód, G. lied, a lay or song; Goth. liuthon, to sing.] A song; as, a loud or soft lay; immortal lays. The lyric poems of the old French minstrels or trouvères were termed lais (lays), but the title appears in modern usage to be peculiarly appropriate to ballads, to narrative poems, or serious subjects of moderate length, in simple style and light metre. 'The Lay of the Last Minstrel.' Sir W. Scott. [Used chiefly in poetry.]

Lay (lā), a. [Fr. lai, L. laicus, a layman; Gr. laikos, from laos, people.] 1. Pertaining to the laity or general mass of people as distinguished from those who are professionally or specially devoted to any pursuit; as, a lay student of law. —3. † Uneducated; unlearned; ignorant. —Lay brother, a person received into a convent of monks, under the three vows, but not in holy orders. —Lay clerk, in the English Ch. a person not in orders who leads the people in their responses. —Lay fee, lands held in fee of a lay lord, as distinguished from those lands which belong to the church. —Lay investiture, investiture with the temporalities of a benefice as distinguished from investiture with the spiritualities. —Lay lord (navut.), a civil member of the admiralty board. —Lay sister, one received into a convent of nuns as a maid-servant, under the vows, but who does not perform any sacred office.

Layd, † (lād), pp. of lay. Prostrated; weak; faint. Spenser.

Lay-day (lā'dā), n. One of a stipulated number of days allowed to a freighter or charterer of a vessel for shipping or unshipping cargo.

Lay-doun (lā'doun), a. A term applied to a style of shirt collars which fold down over the necktie.

Layen, † pl. of lay. Chaucer.

Layer (lā'ér), n. [From lay, the verb.] 1. One who or that which lays. —2. A stratum; a bed; a body spread over another; a coat; as, a layer of clay, sand, or paint. —3. A shoot or twig of a plant, not detached from the stock, partly laid under ground for growth or propagation. —4. In masonry and brick-laying, the same as Course (which see). —Woody layers, the rings of wood which surround the pith in exogenous trees, one being produced for every succession of leaves which the tree puts forth. See EXOGEN.

Layer (lā'ér), v. t. In gardening, to propagate by bending the shoot of a living stem into the soil, the shoot striking root while being fed by the parent plant. The figure shows the branch to be layered bent down and kept in the ground by a hooked peg, the young root-lets, and a stick supporting the extremity of the shoot in an upright position.

Layerboard, Layerboarding (lā'ér-bórd, lā'ér-bórd-ing), n. The boarding for sustaining the lead of gutters.

Layering (lā'ér-ing), n. The operation of propagating plants by layers. See LAYER, v. t.

Layer-out (lā'ér-out), n. One who expends money; a steward.

Layer-up (lā'ér-up), n. One who reposit for future use; a treasurer. Shak.

Layes, † n. pl. Laws. Spenser.

Lay-figure (lā'fig-ūr), n. [D. leeman, lit. jointman, lee- being from leden, pl. of lid, a joint, a limb. See LITH.] A jointed human figure used by painters, made of wood or cork, which can be placed in any attitude, and serves when clothed as a model for draperies, &c. Often applied to a person in real life who is represented as a mere puppet in the hands of others, or to a character in fiction wanting in individuality. Called also Layman.

Laying (lā'ing), n. 1. The act of one who lays; the act of depositing or dropping, as eggs by a hen; the number of eggs laid. —2. In arch. the first coat on lath of plasterers' two-coat work, the surface whereof is roughed by sweeping it with a broom. —Laying on of hands. See IMPOSITION, 1.

Layman (lā'man), n. [Lay, a., and man.] 1. A man who is not a clergyman; one of the laity or people distinct from the clergy; sometimes applied also to a man not professionally or specially devoted to some particular pursuit; as, a layman in medicine or botany.

Being a layman, I ought not to have concerned myself with speculations which belong to the profession. Dryden.

2. [D. leeman.] Same as Lay-figure.

You are to have a layman almost as big as the life for every figure in particular, besides the natural figure before you. Dryden.

Lay-race (lā'rās), n. [Lay for lathe, and race.] In weaving, that part of the lay or lathe on which the shuttle travels from one side to the other of the web.

Lay-sermon (lā'sér-mon), n. A sermon preached or written by a layman; a sermon on secular subjects.

Layship (lā'ship), n. The condition of being a layman. Milton.

Laystall (lā'stāl), n. [Lay, v. t., and stall.] 1. A heap of dung, or a place where dung is laid. 'The common laystall of a city.' Drayton. —2. A place where milch-cows are kept. Simmonds.

Lazar (lā'zār), n. [O. Fr. lazare, from Lazarus (Luke xvi. 20); Sp. lazarro.] A leper; any person infected with nouseau and pestilential disease. 'The lazar in his rags.' Tennyson.

Lazaret (lā'zā-ret), n. Same as Lazaretto.

Lazaretto (lā'zā-ret'tō), n. [Sp. lazaretto, It. lazzaretto, Fr. lazaret, from Lazarus. See LAZAR.] 1. A hospital or pest-house for the reception of diseased persons, particularly for those affected with contagious distempers. At seaports the name is often given to a vessel used for this purpose. —2. The name given to a building or vessel where ships' crews, passengers, and goods are placed during quarantine. —3. In some large merchant ships, a place where provisions and stores for the voyage are laid up.

Lazar-house (lā'zār-hous), n. A lazaretto; also, a hospital for quarantine.

A lazar-house it seemed, wherein were laid Numbers of all diseased. Milton.

Lazarite, Lazarist (lā'zār-it, lā'zār-ist), n. A member of a religious order in the Roman Catholic Church, established about 1620, and deriving its name from the priory of St. Lazarus, which was placed at the disposal of the society in 1632. The primary object was to dispense religious instruction and assistance among the poorer inhabitants of the rural districts of France; but foreign missions are what now chiefly engage its attention.

Lazarlike, Lazarly (lā'zār-lik, lā'zār-li), a. Like a lazar; full of sores; leprous.

A most instant tetter bark'd about, Most Lazarlike, with vile and loathsome crust, All my smooth body. Shak.

Lazaroni (lā'ts-ā-rō'nē), n. pl. See LAZARONI.

Lazarwort (lā'zār-wért), n. See LASERPITUM.

Laze (lāz), v. i. To live in idleness.

He lay lazing andolling upon his couch. South. Sometimes used reflexively.

He that takes liberty to laze himself, and dull his spirits for lack of use, shall find the more he sleeps the more he shall be drowsy. Whately, 1634.

Laze (lāz), v. t. To waste in sloth; to spend, as time, in idleness; as, to laze away one's life.

Lazily (lā'zi-li), adv. In a lazy manner; sluggishly.

Whether he lazily and listlessly dreams away his time. Locke.

Laziness (lā'zi-nes), n. The state or quality of being lazy: (a) indisposition to action or exertion; indolence; sluggishness; habitual sloth.

Laziness travels so slowly, that poverty soon overtakes him. Franklin.

(b) Slowness; as, laziness of motion. Lazuli (lā'zū-li), n. [Sp. and Pg. azul, blue. See AZURE, a.] Lapis lazuli or ultramarine, a mineral of a fine azure-blue colour, usually occurring amorphous, or in rounded masses of a moderate size. It is often marked by yellow spots or veins of sulphide of iron, and is much valued for ornamental work. It is distinguished from lazulite by the intense-ness of its colour. Lazuli is a silicate of sodium, calcium, and aluminium, with a sulphur compound of sodium.

Lazulite (lā'zū-lit), n. Blue-spar, a phosphate of aluminium, magnesium, and iron. A mineral of a light or indigo blue colour, crystallizing in oblique four-sided prisms. Called also Mineral Turquoise.

Lazy (lā'zi), a. [Probably the same word as Goth. lasios, weak, infirm, and allied to A. Sax. leas, leae, false, weak, laessa, E. less, or to E. late, Icel. latr, Dan. late, slow, lazy, O. H. G. laz, slow, dull; G. lass, tired, weary; Goth. lats, sluggish.] 1. Disinclined to action or exertion; naturally or habitually slothful; sluggish; indolent; averse to labour; heavy in motion.

Wicked condemned men will ever live like rogues, and not fall to work, but be lazy and spend vituals. Bacon.

2. Slow; moving slowly or apparently with labour; as, a lazy stream. 'The night-owl's lazy flight.' Shak. —3. † Vicious. B. Jonson. —Lazy weight, scant weight. Hallivell. —Idle, Lazy. See IDLE. —Syn. Slothful, sluggish, slow, dilatory, indolent, idle, inactive.

Lazy-bed (lā'zi-bed), n. A bed for growing potatoes, in which the potatoes are laid on the surface of the soil and covered with earth taken out from trenches on either side. This style of planting potatoes is chiefly confined to Ireland, but was frequent in early Scottish husbandry. It is fitted only for spade husbandry.

Lazybones (lā'zi-bōnz), n. A lazy fellow; an idler.

Lazy-tongs (lā'zi-tongz), n. pl. A kind of tongs or pincers consisting of a series of levers in pairs crossing one another and turning on a pin in the middle like the blades of scissors, while each pair is jointed at the extremities to the next pair or pairs, so that the impulse communicated to the first pair moves the whole system, and causes the last pair to advance considerably, while at the same time its extremities approach one another. They are so named because they enable a person to lift an object at some distance without rising from his chair, couch, &c.

Lazzaroni (lāts-ā-rō'nē), n. pl. sing. Lazzarone (lāts-ā-rō'nā), [It. from Lazarus in the parable, or from the hospital of St. Lazarus, the wretched clothing of which institution they often retained after leaving it.] A name given to the poorer classes at Naples who earn their subsistence as messengers, porters, and occasional servants, or by fishing, but have no fixed habitation, and spend the most of their time in idling.

Lea, lay (lē, lā), n. [O. or Prov. E. and Sc. lay, lay, A. Sax. leah, untilled land, pasture; Dan. dialect lei, fallow; D. leeg, empty, fallow.] A meadow or grassy plain; land under grass or pasture.

The lowing herd winds slowly o'er the lea. Gray.

Lea (lē), n. A measure of yarn, containing in cotton 80 threads, in linen yarn 120, and in worsted 80. Called also a Rap.

Leach (lēch), v. t. and i. and n. See LETOH.

Leacht (lēch), n. [See LEECH.] A physician. Spenser.

Leach (lēch), n. Naut. the border or edge of a sail at the sides. See LEECH.

Leach-crafter (lēch'krāft), n. The art of healing or of physic. Spenser.

Leach-line (lēch'lin), n. Naut. a rope for hauling up the leach of a sail.

Leach-tub. See LETOH-TUB.

Leachy (lēch'f), See LETOHY.

Lead (lēd), n. [A. Sax. lead, lēd, the metal lead; allied to D. lood, Sw. and Dan. lod, G. loth, a weight, a plummet, the lead for taking soundings; Icel. ledda, a sounding line.]

Sym. Pb. At. wt. 207. 1. A metal of a bluish-gray colour: when recently cut it has a strong metallic lustre, but soon tarnishes by exposure to the air owing to the formation of a coating of carbonate of lead. Its specific gravity is about 11.38. It is soft, flexible, and inelastic. It is both malleable and ductile, possessing the former property to a considerable extent, but in tenacity it is inferior to all ductile metals. It fuses at about 612°.

and when slowly cooled forms octohedral crystals. There are four oxides of lead:—

(1.) The suboxide (Pb₂O), of a grayish-blue colour. (2.) The protoxide or yellow oxide (PbO), called also massicot. Litharge is this oxide in the form of small spangles from having undergone fusion. (3.) The red oxide (Pb₃O₄), the well-known pigment called red-lead or minium. (4.) The dioxide or brown oxide (PbO₂), obtained by putting red-lead in chlorine water or in dilute nitric acid.

Of the salts formed by the action of acids on lead or on the protoxide, the carbonate or white-lead and the acetate or sugar of lead are the most important. The protoxide is also employed for glazing earthenware and porcelain. Carbonate of lead is the basis of white oil paint, and of a number of other colours. The extract of lead is a subacetate, and is used as a test and precipitant. The salts of lead are poisonous, but the carbonate is by far the most virulent poison. The lead of commerce, which commonly contains silver, iron, and copper, is extracted from the native sulphide, the galena of mineralogists. The other ores of importance are the selenide, native minium, plumb gomme, white-lead, vitreous lead, phosphate of lead, chloride or horn lead, arsenate of lead. See WHITE-LEAD.—Black-lead. See GRAPHITE.—2. A plummet or mass of lead used in sounding at sea.—To heave the lead, to throw it into the sea for the purpose of taking soundings.—3. In printing, a thin plate of metal used to give space between lines.—4. A small stick of black-lead or plumbago used in pencils.—5. pl. A flat roof covered with lead. 'The tempest crackles on the leads.' Tennyson.

Lead (lēd), a. Made or composed of lead; consisting more or less of lead; produced by lead.—Lead poisoning, poisoning by the introduction of various preparations of lead, as sugar of lead, white-lead, &c., into the body. The disease, if not arrested at an early stage, takes the following forms, each of which may exist alone, or may be complicated with one or more of the others, or may follow the others, there being no definite order of succession: lead colic or painters' colic, lead rheumatism, lead palsy, and disease of the brain.

Lead (lēd), v. t. 1. To cover with lead; to fit with lead.—2. In printing, to widen the space between lines by inserting a lead or thin plate of type-metal.

Lead (lēd), v. t. pret. & pp. led; ppr. leading. [A. Sax. lædan; comp. D. leiden, Icel. leiða, Dan. lede, to lead. The A. Sax. lædan is a causative of lithan, to go or pass (by sea).]

1. To guide by the hand; as, to lead a child.

They . . . thrust him out of the city, and led him unto the brow of the hill. Luke iv. 29.

2. To guide or conduct by showing the way; to direct; as, the Israelites were led by a pillar of cloud by day and by a pillar of fire by night.

He leadeth me beside the still waters. Ps. xxiii. 2.

3. To conduct, as a chief or commander, implying authority; to direct and govern; as, a general leads his troops to battle and to victory.

Christ took not upon him flesh and blood, that he might conquer and rule nations, lead armies, &c. South.

4. To precede; to introduce by going first.

As Hesperus that leads the sun his way. Fairfax.

5. To hold the first place in rank or dignity among; as, the violins were led by so-and-so.—6. To show the method of attaining an object; to direct, as in an investigation; as, self-examination may lead us to a knowledge of ourselves.

Human testimony is not so proper to lead us into the knowledge of the essence of things, as to acquaint us with the existence of things. Watts.

7. In card-playing, to commence a round or trick with; as, he leads hearts; he led the ace of trumps.—8. To draw; to entice; to allure; as, the love of pleasure leads men into vices which degrade and impoverish them.—9. To induce; to prevail on; to influence.

He was driven by the necessities of the times more than led by his own disposition to any rigour of actions. Eiken Basilike.

10. To pass; to spend; as, to lead a life of gaiety, or a solitary life.

That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. 1 Tim. ii. 2.

11. To cause to pass; to cause to spend; to cause to endure: in a bad sense.

You remember the . . . life he led his wife and daughter. Dickens.

—To lead apes in hell. See under APE.—To lead astray, to guide in a wrong way or into error; to seduce from truth or rectitude.—To lead captive, to carry into captivity.—To lead one a dance or a fine dance, to cause one more exertion or trouble than necessary or expected.—To lead the dance, to be the first to open the proceedings; to start an enterprise.—To lead the way, to go before and show the way.

Lead (lēd), v. i. 1. To go before and show the way.

I will lead on softly. Gen. xxxiii. 14.

2. To have precedence or pre-eminence; as, to lead in an orchestra: said of the principal first violin.—3. To have a position of authority as commander or director.—4. To conduct; to bring; to draw; to induce; as, gaming leads to other vices; this road leads to the church; your argument leads to this result.

That law was, it has been seen, rather led to by the general current of the reasoning of mathematicians than discovered by any one. Whewell.

5. In card-playing, to play the first card of a round or trick.—To lead off or out, to begin.

Lead (lēd), n. 1. Precedence; a going before; guidance; as, let the general take the lead.

I lost the run, and had to see Harriet Tristram go away with the best lead to a fast thing. Trollope.

2. The right of playing the first card in a round or trick; the suit or card so played.

All you have got to mind is to return your partner's lead. Whyte Melville.

3. A lane or navigable opening in a field of ice.

Under the lee of an iceberg in a comparatively open lead. Kene.

4. In mining, a lode (which see).—5. In engin. the average distance of travel requisite to remove the earth of an excavation to form an embankment. It is equivalent to the removal of the whole quantity of the material from the centre of gravity of the excavation to the centre of gravity of the embankment.—6. A lade (which see).—7. In a steam-engine, the width of opening of a steam-port.

Lead-arming (lēd'ārm-ing), n. A lump of tallow pressed into the lower end of the sounding-lead, for the purpose of ascertaining the nature of the bottom.

Lead-ash (lēd'ash), n. The slag of lead.

Leaded (lēd'ed), p. and a. 1. Separated by thin plates of lead, as lines in printing.—2. Covered with lead; fitted with lead; set in lead; as, leaded windows.

Leaden (lēdn'), a. 1. Made of lead; as, a leaden ball.—2. Indisposed to action; sluggish; inert.

If he be leaden, icy-cold, unwilling, Be thou so too. Shak.

3. Heavy; dull; gloomy; as, 'Leaden thoughts.' Shak.—4. Stupid; absurd. Fulke, 1580.

Leaden-hearted (lēd'n-hārt-ed), a. Stupid; destitute of feeling.

O leaden-hearted man, to be in love with death! Thomson.

Leaden-heeled (lēd'n-hēld), a. Moving slowly. 'Comforts are leaden-heeled.' Ford.

Leaden-paced (lēd'n-pāst), a. Slow in movement; slow in coming.

By dull and leaden-paced inheritance. J. Baillie.

Leaden-stepping (lēd'n-step-ing), a. Moving slowly. 'The lazy, leaden-stepping hours.' Milton.

Leader (lēd'ēr), n. 1. One that leads or conducts; one that goes or does anything first; a guide; a conductor.—2. A chief; a commander; a captain.—3. The chief of a party or faction, or of a public organized body or a profession; as, the leader of the Whigs or of the Tories; a leader of the Jacobins; the leader of the House of Commons; the leader of the bar.—4. A performer who leads a band or choir in music; specifically, in an orchestra, the player on the principal first violin.—5. A leading article in a newspaper; i. e. an editor's own political or other disquisition.—6. One of the leading or front horses in a team of four or more, as distinguished from a wheeler, or horse placed next the carriage.

With four wheelers two bays and for leaders two grays. R. H. Barham.

7. The principal wheel in any kind of machinery.—8. In mining, a small or insignificant vein which leads to or indicates the proximity of a larger one.—9. pl. In printing, a row of dots, hyphens, and the like, in an index, table of contents, or the like, to lead the eye from any word to the words or figures at the end of the line.—Chief, Commander, Leader, Head. See under CHIEF.

Leadership (lēd'ēr-ship), n. The office of a leader; guidance.

Lead-glance (lēd'glāns), n. Lead-ore; galena (which see).

Lead-gray (lēd'grā), n. A colour resembling that of lead.

Lead-gray, Leaden-gray (lēd'grā, led'n-grā), a. Coloured like lead; as, a leaden-gray sky.

Lead-mill (led'mil), n. A circular plate of lead used by lapidaries for roughing or grinding.

Lead-mine (led'min), n. A mine containing lead or lead-ore.

Lead-pencil (led'pen-sil), n. An instrument for drawing or making lines, usually made by inclosing a slip of plumbago or graphite (which is commonly called black-lead) in a casing of wood.

Lead-plant (led'plant), n. A low-growing leguminous plant of the genus Aerophora (A. canescens), supposed to indicate the presence of lead. It is a native of the north-western states of America.

Lead-screw (léd'skrö), n. In mech. the main screw of a lathe, which gives the feed-motion to the slide-rest.

Leadsmen (ledz'man), n. Naut. the man who heaves the lead.

Lead-spar (led'spär), n. A mineral, the carbonate of lead or cerusite.

Lead-work (led'wérk), n. 1. The part of a building or other structure in which lead is the principal material used.—2. A place where lead is extracted from the ore.

Leadwort (led'wért), n. [So named because the teeth acquire a lead colour by chewing its root.] The English name of Plumbago, a genus of plants. See PLUMBAGO.

Lead'y (led'i), a. Pertaining to or resembling lead in any of its properties.

His ruddy lips (were) wan, and his eyes lead'y and hollow. Sir T. Elyot.

Leaf (lэф), n. pl. Leaves (lэфz). [A. Sax. laef; comp. O. Sax. luf, Goth. laufs, Icel. lauf, Dan. løv, D. loof, G. laub, a leaf; allied to Lith. lapas, a leaf.] 1. In bot. the green deciduous part of a plant, usually shooting from the sides of the stem and branches, but sometimes from the root, by which the sap is supposed to be elaborated or fitted for the nourishment of the plant by being exposed to air and light on its extensive surface. When fully developed the leaf generally consists of two parts, an expanded part, called the blade or limb, and a stalk supporting that part, called the petiole or leaf-stalk. Frequently, however, the petiole is wanting, in which case the leaf is said to be sessile. Leaves are produced by an expansion of the bark at a node of the stem, and generally consist of vascular tissue in the veins or ribs, with cellular tissue or parenchyma filling up the interstices, and an epidermis over all. Some leaves, however, as those of the mosses, are entirely cellular. See extract.

A plant is composed of the axis and its appendages: the axis appearing above ground as the stem and branches, below ground as the root; the appendages being entirely above ground, and essentially leaves; all organs which are not formed of the axis being modified leaves. The proof of this consists very much in the gradual transition of one organ into another, manifest in some plants, although not in others; as of leaves into bracts, one of the most frequently gradual transitions; of leaves into sepals, as seen in the leaf-like sepals of many roses; of sepals into petals, as seen in the petal-like sepals of lilies, crocuses, &c.; and even of stamens into pistils, often exemplified in the common houseleek.

2. Something resembling a leaf in any of its properties, as (a) the part of a book or folded sheet containing two pages. (b) A side, division, or part of a flat body, the parts of which move on hinges, as folding-doors, window-shutters, a fire-screen, &c.; the part of a table which can be raised or lowered at pleasure. Leather-back (lêth'ér-bak), n. A marine tortoise of the genus Sphargis (S. coriacea), so called from its carapace being covered with a leather-like skin. It is a common species in the Mediterranean, and has been occasionally taken on our own coasts.

Leather-cloth (lêth'ér-kloth), n. The name given to various fabrics made so as to resemble leather, and possess some of its qualities without being so costly. These are for the most part formed by varnishing some textile material, as unbleached cotton, linen, woollen, alpaca, &c., with various coatings of some resinous substance, as caoutchouc, linoleum, &c., and, if required, by painting or embossing it.

Leather-coat (lêth'ér-kôt), n. An apple or potato with a tough coat or rind.

Leather-dresser (lêth'ér-dres'ér), n. One who dresses leather; one who prepares hides for use.

Leatherette (lêth'ér-et), n. A kind of imitation leather used in bookbinding.

Leather-flower (lêth'ér-flou-ér), n. A North American climbing plant of the genus Clematis (C. viorna), so named from its purplish sepals being thick and leathery.

Leather-head (lêth'ér-hed), n. An Australian bird, the Tropidorhynchus corniculatus, a species of honey-eater. So called from its head being devoid of feathers and presenting a leathery appearance. Called also Friar-bird (which see).

Leather-jack (lêth'ér-jak), n. A jug made of leather; a black-jack (which see).

Leather-mouthed (lêth'ér-mouf'hd), a. Having a mouth like leather; smooth and without teeth.

By leather-mouthed fish, I mean such as have their teeth in their throat, as the chub. Walton.

Leathern (lêth'érn), a. Made of leather; consisting of leather; as, a leathern purse. 'A leathern girdle.' Mat. iii. 4.

Leather-winged (lêth'ér-wingd), a. Having wings like leather, as the bat.

Leather-wood (lêth'ér-wyd), n. Dirca palustris, nat. order Thymelacæ, a much-branched bush of the United States, with small yellow flowers, very flexible jointed branches, and a tough, leathery, fibrous bark, which is used by the Indians for thongs. The twigs are used for baskets, &c. Called also Moose-wood and Wicopy.

Leathery (lêth'ér-i), a. Pertaining to or resembling leather; tough.

Leave (lêv), n. [A.Sax. leaf, geleaf, leofa, leave, permission; lufan, lêfan, to permit; O.E. leve, to permit, and to believe—the lieve in believe; D. lof in oorlof, Icel. leify, permission; leifya, to permit; lof, praise, permission; lofa, to permit; G. erlauben, to permit, glauben, to believe. Allied to E. love, loaf, G. lob, praise; L. libet, it is pleasing.] 1. Liberty granted by which restraint or illegality is removed; permission; allowance; license.

Get leave to work
In the world—'tis the best you get at all. E. B. Browning.

2. The act of departing; a formal parting of friends or acquaintances; farewell; adieu: used chiefly in the phrase to take leave. Acts xviii. 18. 'Take last leave of all I loved.' Tennyson.—Leave, Liberty, License. Leave implies that there is a choice in the matter; that the permission granted may be used or not; leave is employed on familiar occasions. Liberty is given in more important matters, indicating complete freedom and that all obstacles are completely removed from the path. License, lit. the state of being permitted by law, implies that permission is granted by public authority: it frequently carries a much stronger meaning than liberty, implying that advantage to the very utmost may be taken of the permission even to the verge of abuse.

No friend has leave to bear away the dead. Dryden.
I am for the full liberty of diversion (for children). Locke.

License they mean, when they call liberty. Milton.

Leave (lêv), v.t. pret. & pp. left; ppr. leaving. [A.Sax. læfan, to leave, to cause to remain, from lufan, to remain; Icel. leifya, O.Fris. beleva, O.H.G. lufan, to leave, whence be-lufan, Mod. G. bleiben, not to leave, to remain. See LIVE.] 1. To withdraw or depart from; to quit for a longer or shorter time indefinitely, or for perpetuity; as, we leave home for a day or a year.

Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife. Gen. ii. 24.

2. To forsake; to desert; to abandon; to relinquish; to resign; to renounce.

We have left all, and have followed thee. Mark x. 28.

As the heresies that men do leave
Are hated most of those they did deceive. Shak.

3. To suffer to remain; not to take or remove.

Let no man leave of it till the morning. Ex. xvi. 19.

4. To have remaining at death.

There be of them that have left a name behind them. Eccles. xiv. 8.

5. To commit or trust to, as a deposit; as, I left the papers in the care of the consul.—

6. To bequeath; to give by will; as, the deceased has left his lands to his sons, but he has left a legacy to his only daughter.

That peace which made thy prosperous reign to shine,
That peace thou leav'st to thy imperial line,
That peace, O happy shade, be ever thine. Dryden.

7. To permit or allow.

Whether Esau were a vassal, I leave the reader to judge. Locke.

8. To refer; to commit for decision; as, to leave a question to an umpire.—9. To cease or desist from; to forbear.

Let us return; lest my father leave caring for the asses, and take thought for us. 1 Sam. ix. 5.

—To be left to one's self, to be left alone; to be permitted to follow one's own opinions or desires.—To leave off, (a) to desist from; to forbear; as, to leave off work at six o'clock. (b) To cease wearing; as, to leave off a garment. (c) To give up or cease to associate with.

He began to leave off some of his old acquaintance. Arbutnot.

He searched, and began at the eldest, and left at the youngest. Gen. xlv. 12.

2. To take one's departure; to depart; to set out.—To leave off, to cease; to desist; to stop. 'Leave off, and for another summons wait.' Roscommon.

Leave† (lêv), v.t. [Fr. lever, to raise.] To raise; to levy.

And after all an army strong she leav'd,
To war on those which him had of his realm bereav'd. Spenser.

Leave (lêv), v.i. To send out, or become clothed with leaves; to leaf.

Leaved (lêvd), a. 1. Furnished with foliage or leaves.—2. Having a leaf, or made with leaves or folds; as, a two-leaved gate.

Leaveless (lêv'les), a. Destitute of leaves.

Leaveless, a. Without leave or permission.

Chaucer.

Leaven (lêv'n), n. [Fr. levain, from lever, L. levo, to raise.] 1. Any substance that produces or is designed to produce fermentation, as in dough; especially, a mass of sour dough, which, mixed with a larger quantity of dough or paste, produces fermentation in it and renders it light; yeast; barm.—2. Anything that resembles leaven in its effects, as by causing a general change, especially a change for the worse.

Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees. Mat. xvi. 6.

Leaven (lêv'n), v.t. 1. To excite fermentation in; to raise and make light, as dough or paste.

A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. 1 Cor. v. 6.

2. To taint; to imbue.

With these and the like deceivable doctrines he leavens all his prayer. Milton.

Leavening (lêv'n'ing), n. 1. The act of making light by means of leaven; the act of exciting fermentation in anything.—2. That which leavens or makes light.

Leavenous (lêv'n-us), a. Containing leaven; tainted. 'Unsincere and leavenous doctrine.' Milton.

Leaver (lêv'ér), n. One who leaves or relinquishes; one who forsakes.

Leave-taking (lêv'ták-ing), n. Taking of leave; parting compliments.

Low at leave-taking, with his brandish'd plume
Brushing his instep, bow'd the all-amorous earl. Tennyson.

Leaviness (lêv'i-nes), n. State of being leavy or full of leaves.

Leaving (lêv'ing), n. [Almost always in the plural.] 1. Something left; remnant; relic. 'The leavings of Pharsalia.' Addison.—2. Refuse; offal. 'The leavings of the feast.' Somerville.

Lecidineæ, Lecidineæ (les-i-dín'è-i, les-i-dín'è-è), n. pl. A natural order of gymnocarpous lichens, in which the open orbicular disc of the fruit is contained in a distinct receptacle. It contains some of the most obscure but, at the same time, some of the most beautiful of lichens.

Lecstone (lek'stón), n. A granular variety of trap rock, originally volcanic ash, quarried among the carboniferous strata of Fife and the Lothians for the bottom slabs of ovens.

Lectern (lek'térn), n. [O. Fr. lectrin; L. L. lectrinum, lectrum, pulpit, Gr. lektron, couch.]

Lectern, Yeovil, Somersetshire.

The desk or stand on which the larger books used in the services of the Roman Catholic and similar churches are placed. Since the Reformation they have been seldom used in this country, but are occasionally employed to hold the Bible. The principal lectern stood in the middle of the choir, there being sometimes others in different places. It was usually of wood or brass and movable, but sometimes of stone or marble and fixed. It was often covered with costly hangings, embroidered in the same manner as the hangings of the altar. In Scotland the same name is given to the preacher's desk in front of the pulpit.

Lectica (lek-tí'ka), n. [L.] In ancient Rome, a kind of couch or litter in which persons were carried. They were of two classes, viz., those for the living, and those for conveying the dead to the grave. The latter were used also by the Greeks.

Lectio (lek'shón), n. [L. lectio, from lego, to read.] 1. The act of reading.—2. A difference or variety in copies of a manuscript or book; a reading.

We ourselves are offended by the obtrusion of the new lectures into the text.
De Quincey.

3. A lesson or portion of Scripture read in divine service.

Lectiary (lek'shón-a-ri), n. A book for use in religious worship, containing portions of Scripture to be read for particular days.

Lectisternium (lek-tí-stér'ni-um), n. [L. lectus, a couch, and sternō, to spread out.] In class. antiq. a sacrifice in the nature of a feast, in which the Greeks and Romans placed the images of their gods reclining on couches round tables furnished with viands, as if they were about to partake of them.

Lector (lek'tér), n. [L.] In the early Church, a person set apart for the purpose of reading parts of the Bible and other writings of a religious character to the people.

Lectorne, † n. A lectern (which see). Chaucer.

Lectul (lek'tú-al), a. [L. lectus, a bed.] In med. confining to the bed; as, a lectul disease.

Lecture (lek'túr), n. [Fr. lecture, from L. lectura, from lego, to read.] 1. The act or practice of reading. 'In the lecture of Holy Scriptures.' Sir T. Browne.—2. A discourse on some subject whether read or not; especially, a formal or methodical discourse intended for instruction; as, a lecture on morals, &c.—3. A reprimand, as from a superior; a formal reproof.

Numidia will be blest by Cato's lectures. Addison.

4. In universities, the going over of a piece of work with a professor or tutor; a professorial or tutorial disquisition.

Lecture (lek'túr), v. t. pret. & pp. lectured; prp. lecturing. 1. To instruct by discourses. 2. To speak to dogmatically or authoritatively; to reprimand; to improve; as, to lecture one for his faults.—3. To influence by means of a lecture or formal reprimand; as, he was lectured into doing that.

Lecture (lek'túr), v. i. 1. To read or deliver a formal discourse.—2. To deliver lectures for instruction; as, the professor lectures on geometry or on chemistry.

Lecturer (lek'túr-ér), n. 1. One who reads or pronounces lectures; a professor or any instructor who delivers formal discourses for the instruction of others.—2. A preacher in a church, hired by the parish or vestry to assist the rector, vicar, or curate.

He got a lectureship in town of sixty pounds a year, where he preached constantly in person. Swift.

Lecturn (lek'térn), n. A reading-desk. See LECTERN.

Lecythidaceæ (lè-sith'í-dá'sè-è), n. pl. [See LECYTHIS.] A nat. order of South American exogens, consisting of large trees with stipulate leaves and showy flowers, and closely allied to Myrtaceæ, of which it is now usually regarded as a sub-order. The fruit is a woody capsule often opening with a lid, and the seed-vessels are used as cups. Brazil-nuts and Sapucaia-nuts are the seeds of trees of this order. There are seven genera, of which Lecythis may be regarded as the type. See LECYTHIS.

Lecythis (lè'sí-this), n. [Fr. Gr. lektythos, an oil-jar, in allusion to the form of the seed-vessels.] A genus of American trees belonging to the nat. order Lecythidaceæ (by some included in the nat. order Myrtaceæ). The species yield eatable seeds. L. Ollaria is the most gigantic tree in the ancient forests of Brazil: the fruit is a hard capsule, furnished with a lid like a pot, containing large seeds in its interior, of which monkeys are fond, for which reason the capsules are often called monkey-pots and the tree the monkey-pot tree. The seeds of this and other species are frequently sold in our shops under the name of Sapucaia-nuts.

Led (led), pret. & pp. of lead.

Led (led), a. A term applied to a landed possession not occupied by the owner or the person who rents it, or a district ruled over by deputy; as, a led farm, &c.

He transferred the Markgraffdom to Brandenburg, probably as more central in his wide lands; Silesia was henceforth the led Markgraffdom or Mark, and soon falls out of notice in the world. Carlyle.

Leda (lè'da), n. 1. In classical myth, the mother by Jupiter of Helen, Castor, and Pollux.—2. A small planet or asteroid, between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter, discovered by Chacornac, 12th Jan. 1858.

Led-captain (led'kap-tán or led'kap-tín), n. An obsequious attendant; a favourite that follows as if led by a string.

They will never want some creditable led-captain to attend them at a minute's warning to operas, plays, &c. Chesterfield.

Ledden, † Leden (led'en), n. [A. Sax. leden, lyden, language, a corruption of Latin.] Language; dialect.

Thereto he was expert in prophecies, And could the ledden of the gods unfold. Spenser.

Ledge, † v. t. To allege. Chaucer.

Ledge (lej), n. [From A. Sax. leggan, to lay; comp. Sc. leggin, Icel. lög, the ledge or rim at the bottom of a cask.] 1. A shelf on which articles may be placed; anything which resembles such a shelf.

The lowest ledge or row should be merely of stone. Wotton.

2. A prominent part; a part rising or projecting beyond the rest; a ridge; as, a ledge of rocks.

Pines that plumed the craggy ledge. Tennyson.

3. In arch. a small moulding; also, a string course.—4. In joinery, a piece against which something rests, as the side of a rebate, against which a door or shutter is stopped, or a projecting fillet serving the same purpose as the stop of a door, or the fillet which confines a window-frame in its place.—5. Naut. a small piece of timber placed athwart ships under the deck, between the beams.—6. A bar for fastening a gate. [Provincial.]

Ledgement (lej'ment), n. In arch. (a) a horizontal course of mouldings, as the base-mouldings of a building. (b) The development of the surface of any solid on a plane, so that its dimensions may be readily obtained.

Ledger (lej'ér), n. [Ledger may be simply a book that rests on a ledge or shelf; in any case from the same root. Comp. leger, leiger, leider, formerly an ambassador resident at a foreign court, and so used by Shakespeare, and the adjective leger, leiger, resting in a place, whence ledger-bait, 'which is fixed or made to rest in a certain place when you shall be absent from it,' Walton; and leger-book, a cartulary or register, so called from lying permanently in the place to which it relates.] 1. The principal book of accounts among merchants and others who have to keep an accurate record of money transactions, so arranged as to exhibit on one side all the sums at the debit of the accounts and on the other all those at the credit.

The ledger contains an abstract of all the entries made in the journal, classified under the heads of their respective accounts. It is an index to the information contained in the journal, and also a complete abstract of the actual state of all accounts. Pop. Ency.

2. In arch. a flat slab of stone, such as is laid horizontally over a grave; the covering-slab of an altar-tomb.—3. In building, a piece of timber used in forming a scaffolding. Ledgers are fastened to the vertical bars or uprights, and support the putlogs which lie at right angles to the wall, and carry the boards on which the workmen stand.

Ledger-book (lej'ér-byk), n. Same as Ledger.

Ledum (lè'dum), n. [Gr. lèdon, the name for a plant now known as the Cistus ledon.] A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Ericaceæ. The species are low shrubs with alternate entire leaves, clothed with rusty wool underneath and small white flowers in terminal clusters.

Lee (lé), n. [A. Sax. hleō, a shade, a shelter, refuge, asylum; the Icel. hle (Dan. lee, G. lee) coincide, however, more closely with the modern usage of the word; comp. sigla & hle, to sail to leeward, hle-borih, G. lee-board, lee-board; connected with Goth. hlja, a tent; comp. Sc. lythe, sheltered, or a spot sheltered from the wind, also W. clyd, sheltering, warm.] The quarter toward which the wind blows, as opposed to that from which it proceeds; the shelter caused by an object interposed, and keeping off the wind; almost exclusively a nautical term.—Under the lee of (naut.), on that side which is sheltered from the wind; on the side opposite to that against which the wind blows; protected from the wind by; as, under the lee of a ship or of the land.—To lay a ship by the lee, to bring her so that all her sails may lie flat against the masts and shrouds, and the wind come right upon her broadside.

Lee (lé), n. Naut. of or pertaining to the part or side towards which the wind blows; opposite to weather; as, the lee side of a vessel.—Lee shore, the shore under the lee of a ship, or that toward which the wind blows.—Lee tide, a tide running in the same direction as the wind is blowing.

Lee (lé), n. [See LEES.] The coarser part of a liquid which settles at the bottom; sediment: mostly used in the plural form, but frequently with a singular sense.

The woman, Henry, shall put off her pride
For thee; my cloaths, my sex, exchange'd for thee,
I'll mingle with the people's wretched lee. Prior.

Leet (lé), n. Same as Lea.

Leet (lé), v.t. To lie. See LIE.

Lee-board (lé'bôrd), n. A long flat piece of Dutch Galliot, with Lee-boards.

wood attached to each side of a flat-bottomed vessel (as a Dutch galliot) by a bolt on which it traverses. When close-hauled the one on the lee side is let down, and reaching below the keel, when the ship is listed over by the wind, it prevents her from drifting fast to leeward.

Leech (lêch), n. [A. Sax. lece, lece, a physician, a leech; Goth. leikeis, leikes, O.H.G. lahhi, Icel. lœknart, lœknir, Sw. läkare, a physician; Sw. läka, Dan. læge, Icel. lœkna, A. Sax. lœcman, lœcman, to heal, to cure. Allied to Gael. leighis, to heal.] 1. A physician; a professor of the art of healing. 'With the hie Godde that is our souls leeches.
Chaucer. [Antiquated.]

Thither came
The king's own leech to look into his hurt.
Tennyson.

2. The common name of several genera of discophorous hermaphrodite blood-sucking worms of the order Suctoria, forming the family Hirudinidae. Leeches chiefly inhabit fresh-water ponds, though some live among moist grass, and some are marine. The body is composed of many rings, and is provided with two suckers, one at either extremity. By adhering with these suckers alternately the animal can draw itself backward or forward. Aquatic leeches can also swim with considerable rapidity. The mouth is situated in the middle of the anterior suckers, and is furnished with three small white teeth, serrated along the edges, and provided with muscles powerful enough to enable the animal to inflict its peculiar triradiate wound. The species generally employed for medical purposes belong to the genus Sanguisuga, of which genus there are two species employed in Europe, S. officinalis (the Hungarian or green leech), used in the south of Europe, and S. medicinalis (the brown, speckled, or English leech), used in the north of Europe. The latter variety is now rare in this country by reason of the draining of bogs and ponds where it formerly abounded. The horse-leech is Hæmopsis sanguisorba, a common native of Britain.

Leech (lêch), n. [L. G. leik, Icel. lêk, Sw. lêk, Dan. lêg, leech-line, bolt-rope.] Naut. the border or edge of a sail which is sloping or perpendicular; as, the fore-leech, the after-leech, &c.

Lemma (lêm'ma), n. [Gr. lēmna, from lambanō, to receive.] In math. a preliminary or preparatory proposition laid down and demonstrated for the purpose of facilitating or rendering more perspicuous the demonstration of some other proposition or propositions, or the construction of a problem.

Whatever is—so much I conceive to have been a fundamental lemma for Hazlitt—is wrong. De Quincey.

Lemman†, n. Same as Leman. Chaucer.

Lemming, Leming (lêm'ing), n. [Dan. and N.; Sw. lemel.] The popular name applied to a group of rodent mammals, very nearly allied to the mouse and rat, and constituting the genus Myodes of some naturalists, Lemmus of others. There are several species, varying in size and colour according to the regions they inhabit. They are found in Norway, Lapland, Siberia, and the northern parts of America. Those of Norway are about the size of a water-rat, while those of Lapland and Siberia are scarcely larger than a field-mouse. The most noted species is the common or European lemming (M. Lemmus). It is very prolific, and vast hordes periodically migrate towards the Atlantic and the Gulf of Bothnia, destroying all vegetation in their path. Vast numbers of wild animals—bears, wolves, foxes—hang upon them in their march, making them their prey, thus tending to keep their numbers in some degree in check. Such migrations are said to portend a hard winter.

Lemmus (lêm'us), n. See LEMMING.

Lemna (lêm'ma), n. [Gr. lēmna, a water-plant.] A genus of well known aquatic annuals, belonging to the nat. order Lemnaceæ or duck-weed tribe. They consist of small or minute floating fronds, with simple roots or rootlets, usually propagated by budding, and almost destitute of vascular tissue. The very minute flowers are produced from the edge or the middle of the frond. Four species are natives of Britain, and are known by the common name of Duck-meal, Duck's-meal, or Duck-weed. See DUCK-MEAT.

Lemnaceæ (lêm-nâ'sê-ê), n. pl. A nat. order of monocotyledons. They are floating plants, with lenticular or lobed leaves or fronds, bearing one or two monocious flowers, inc, Plano-convex. d, Double-convex.

e, Meniscus. f, Concavo-convex.

than the cavity, or if the two surfaces would meet if produced, the lens is called a meniscus; and if the concavity be greater than the convexity, the lens is termed concavo-convex.—Crystalline lens or humour, the middle humour of the eye, which is shaped like a double-convex lens. See CRYSTALLINE and EYE.—Coddington lens, or grooved sphere, a lens which consists of a sphere of glass divided into two portions by a deeply cut circular groove, which is filled up with opaque matter.—Stanhope lens, a lens of small diameter with two convex faces of different radii, and inclosed in a metallic tube.—Multiplying lens, a lens one side of which is plane and the other convex, but made up of a number of plane faces inclined to one another, each of which presents a separate image of the object viewed through it, so that the object is, as it were, multiplied.—Polygonal lens, see POLYZONAL.

Lent (lent), pp. of lend.

Lent† (lent), a. [L. lentus, slow, gentle.] Slow; gentle; mild.

Lent (lent), n. [A. Sax. lenten, lengten, spring, lenten-fæsten, spring fast, Lent; D. lente, G. lenz, spring; perhaps from A. Sax. lang, leng, long, longer, because the days become longer in spring.] A fast of forty days, beginning at Ash-Wednesday and continuing till Easter, observed by some Christian churches in commemoration of the forty days' fast of Christ.

Lent (lent). Same as Lento.

Lentando (len-tan'dō). [It.] In music, slackening; retarding; a direction to sing or play the notes over which it is written with increasing slowness.

Lentement, Lentamente (läht-mäh, len-ta-men'tä), adv. [Fr. and It., slowly.] In music, an instruction prefixed to a movement showing that it is to be performed in slow time.

Lenten (lent'en), a. Pertaining to Lent; used in Lent; spare; plain; not abundant or ostentatious; as, a lenten salad. 'Lenten entertainment.' Shak.

Who can read

In thy pale face, dead eye, and lenten suit,
The liberty thy ever-giving hand
Hath bought for others? Beau. & Fl.

Lentibulariæ (len-tib'ü-lä'r'i-ë-ë), n. pl. A small nat. order of monopetalous exogens, growing in water or in marshy places, sometimes epiphytes, with rosulate root-leaves (which are sometimes reduced to very small scales), and erect one-flowered scapes, or simple (rarely branched) racemes. The flowers (which are often large and handsome) are usually yellow, violet, or blue. There are four genera, of which Utricularia and Pinguicula are the best known, and about 180 species, natives of moist, warm, and temperate regions of both hemispheres.

Lenticel, Lenticelle (len-ti-sel), n. [Fr. lenticelle, L. lenticula, dim. of lens, lentil, a lentil.] 1. In bot. (a) one of the small oval spots found on the surface of young stems, especially of dicotyledonous shrubs and trees, and erroneously supposed by some to be root-buds, and by others to be breathing pores. Microscopic examination shows that they are mere hypertrophied productions from the epiphleum or outer layer of the bark, and have no connection with the liber or cambium. (b) A small lens-shaped gland on the under side of some leaves.—2. In anat. a lenticular gland.

Lenticellate (len-ti-sel-ät), a. Pertaining to or having lenticels.

Lenticula (len-tik'ü-lä), n. [See LENTICELS.] 1. In optics, a small lens.—2. In bot. a lenticel. See LENTICEL.—3. In med. a freckle; lentigo.

Lenticular (len-tik'ü-lär), a. [L. lenticularis, from lens, a lentil.] 1. Resembling a lentil in size or form.—2. Having the form of a double-convex lens, as the seeds of Amaranthus.—Lenticular gland, in anat. a mucous follicle having the shape of a lentil, observed especially toward the base of the tongue.—Lenticular ganglion, the ophthalmic ganglion, a reddish-gray body near the bottom of the orbit of the eye at the outer side of the optic nerve.—Lenticular fever, fever attended with an eruption of small pimples.—Lenticular bed, in geol. a deposit in a shallow limited basin.

Lenticularly (len-tik'ü-lär-li), adv. In the manner of a lens; with a curve.

Lenticule (len-ti-kül), n. Same as Lenticula.

Lenticulite (len-tik'ü-lit), n. In geol. a fossil of a lenticular shape.

Lentiform (len-ti-form), a. [L. lens, and forma, form.] Of the form of a lens; lenticular.

Lentiginose (len-tij'in-ös), a. In bot. covered with minute dots as if dusted.

Lentiginous (len-tij'in-us), a. [L. lentigo, a freckle, from L. lens, lentil, a lentil.] Pertaining to lentigo; freckly; scurfy; furfuraceous.

Lentigo (len-tij'gō), n. [L.] In med. a freckly eruption on the skin.

Lentil (len'til), n. [Fr. lentille, from L. lens, lentil, a lentil.] A plant and its seed of the genus Ervum (E. lens, Linn.), belonging to the papilionaceous division of the nat. order Leguminosæ. It is an annual plant, rising with weak stalks about 18 inches. The seeds, which are contained in a pod, are round, flat, and a little convex in the middle. It is cultivated for fodder and for its seeds, from which revalenta arabica is prepared.

Lentiscus, Lentisk (len-tis'kus, lent'isk), n. [L., the mastich-tree.] A tree of the genus Pistacia, P. lentiscus (the mastich-tree), a native of Arabia, Persia, Syria, and the south of Europe. It belongs to the nat. order Anacardiaceæ. The wood is of a pale brown, and resinous and fragrant. See MASTICH.

Lentitude† (len'ti-tūd), n. [L. lentus, slow.] Slowness.

Lentner, Lentiner (lent'nér, lent'i-nér), n. [From Lent, because taken during that season.] A kind of hawk. Iz. Walton.

Lento (lent'ō). [It.] In music, a direction indicating that the music to which the word is prefixed is to be performed slowly.

Lenton, n. The season of Lent. Chaucer.

Lentor (lent'ér), n. [L., from lentus, slow, tough, clammy; Fr. lenteur.] 1. Tenacity; viscosity; viscosity, as of fluids. 'Their clamminess and lentor.' Evelyn.—2. Slowness; delay; sluggishness. 'The lentor of eruptions not inflammatory.' Arbuthnot.

Lentous† (lent'us), a. [L. lentus, slow, thick.] Viscid; viscous; tenacious. 'This spawn of a lentous and transparent body.' Sir T. Browne.

L'envoy, L'envoy (läh-vwä), n. [Fr. See ENVOY.] 1. A sort of postscript appended to literary compositions, and serving either to recommend them to the attention of some particular person, or to enforce what we call the moral of them; an explanatory or commendatory postscript.

Moth. Is not l'envoy a salve?

Arm. No, page: it is an epilogue or discourse, to make plain
Some obscure precedence that hath tofore been said. Shak.

2. A conclusion; a result.

I looked for this l'envoy. Massinger.

Lenzinite (len-zin'it), n. [From Lenz, a German mineralogist.] A variety of halloysite, a mineral of two kinds, the opaline and argillaceous. It is a hydrous silicate of alumina, and occurs usually in small masses of the size of a nut.

Leo (lē'ō), n. [L.] The Lion, the fifth sign of the zodiac. It contains ninety-five stars; one of them, of the first magnitude, in the breast of the Lion, is called Regulus, and Cor Leonis or Lion's Heart.—It is marked thus ♌.—Leo Minor, the Little Lion, a constellation of the northern hemisphere containing fifty-three stars.

Leod, Lede, n. [A. Sax. leōd, leōda, a man, a countryman, leōde, people.] A man; a countryman; people; a nation.

Leon, n. A lion. Chaucer.

Leonese (lē-o-nēz'), n. sing. and pl. A native or inhabitant of Leon in Spain; in the plural, the inhabitants of Leon.

Leonese (lē-o-nēz'), a. Of or pertaining to Leon in Spain, or its inhabitants.

Leonhardite (lē-on-härd'it), n. [After Professor von Leonhard.] A mineral, consisting chiefly of the hydrous silicate of alumina and lime, found in Hungary.

Leonides (lē-on'it-dēz), n. pl. A name given to the group of meteors observed in the month of November each year, but occurring with extreme profusion about three times in a century: so called because they seem to radiate from the constellation Leo.

Leoline (lē'o-nin), a. [L. leontinus, from leo, lion.] Belonging to a lion; resembling a lion or partaking of his qualities; as, leontine fierceness or rapacity.

Leonline (lē'o-nin), n. A counterfeit copper coin of the reign of Edward I., worth about a halfpenny, coined abroad and smuggled into England: so called from bearing the figure of a lion.

Leonine (lē'o-nin), a. [From Leon or Leontinus, a canon of the order of St. Benedict in Paris in the twelfth century, who wrote largely in this measure.] A term applied to a certain Latin measure popular in the middle ages, consisting of hexameter and pentameter verses, rhyming at the middle and end. The following Latin version of 'The devil was sick,' &c., is a leonine couplet:—

Dæmon languebat, monachus tunc esse volebat,

Ast ubi convalescit, mansit ut ante fuit.

Ovid practised this sort of versification, especially in his epistles; for example—

Cultaque Orestes Taurica terra Deæ.

Lines having a similar character are not rare in English poetry:—

From my wings are shaken the dews that waken

The sweet birds every one.

When rocked to rest on their mother's breast,

As she dances about the sun. Shelley.

Leoninely (lē'o-nin-li), adv. In a leonine manner; like a lion.

Leontodon (lē-on'tō-don), n. [Gr. leōn, leontos, a lion, and odontos, odontos, a tooth—in reference to the tooth-like divisions of the leaves.] A genus of plants of the nat. order Composite; lion's-tooth. As now defined it includes about forty species, several of which were formerly placed in separate genera. They are perennial (rarely annual) herbs, with entire or pinnate radical leaves, simple or sparingly branched leafless scapes, and yellow flowers. They are natives of Europe, Central and Western Asia, and Northern Africa, one (L. autumnale) being naturalized in North America.

Leonurus (lē-o-nūrus), n. [Gr. leōn, a lion, and oura, a tail—in allusion to the appearance of the spike of flowers.] A genus of plants of the nat. order Labiatæ. It includes about ten species, natives of Europe and extra-tropical Asia, one (L. Cardiacæ) having spread throughout the world. They are erect herbs, with cut or lobed leaves, which are longer than the dense axillary whorls of sessile red or whitish flowers. L. Cardiacæ (the common motherwort) is more or less naturalized in Britain, growing in hedges and waste places.

Leopard (lē'pard), n. [L. leo, lion, and pardus, a panther.] A carnivorous digitigrade mammal belonging to the genus Felis. It inhabits Central Africa, Persia, China, and India. The general colour of the leopard is yellowish fawn, which grows paler in the sides till it merges into the white of the under part of the body. Over the head, neck, back, and limbs are scattered black spots of various sizes, while the sides are covered with numerous rose-shaped spots. The common leopard is the Felis leopardus; the hunting leopard or chetah, the Felis jubata, a useful and docile species which inhabits the greater part both of Asia and Africa. (See CHETAH.) Some naturalists regard the panther and leopard as varieties of the same species; others, following Cuvier, regard them as different species, designing the panther Felis pardus.

Leopard's-bane (lep'ardz-bän), n. The English popular name of Doronicum Pardalanches, nat. order Compositæ. It is a robust plant, with large roughish leaves and conspicuous yellow flower-heads. It is said to have been used formerly to destroy leopards, wolves, and other wild animals.

Leopard-wood (lep'ard-wud), n. The wood of Brosimum Aubletii. Also said to be applied to a fancy-word of the palm tribe.

Leopard, L. Leopard, †, n. Aleopard. Chaucer.

Lepadidæ (le-pa'di-dë), n. pl. The barnacles or goose-mussels, a family of cirriped crustaceans, free-swimming when in the larva state, but when adult attached by the antennæ to submarine bodies. The antennæ become developed into a long flexible muscular peduncle, bearing at its free end a calcareous shell, usually of five valves, which protects the principal organs and opens at will to admit of the protrusion of jointed and ciliated rudimentary limbs or tentacles, having near the base slender processes homologous with the gills of higher crustacea. The Lepadidæ are mostly hermaphrodite, but in some species the animal of the normal form is strictly female, having one or more males of minute size and more simple organization lodged inside its shell. In others which, though hermaphrodite, have the male organs less developed than the female, similar males are met with, and are termed complemental males.

Lepadite (lep'a-dit), n. [L. lepas, Gr. lepas, a kind of shell-fish.] The barnacle, one of the Lepadidæ (which see).

Lepadogaster (lep'a-do-gas-tër), n. [Gr. lepas, lepas, a limpet, and gaster, the belly.] A genus of small acanthopterygious fishes which have the power of attaching themselves to rocks and other hard substances by means of a disk or sucker formed by the modification of the pectoral fins.

Lepal (lé'pal), n. In bot. a barren transformed stamen.

Lepas (lé'pas), n. [L. and Gr., a limpet.] A genus of cirripeds, of which the barnacle (L. anatifera) is an example. They adhere in clusters to rocks, shells, floating wood, &c. See LEPADIDÆ.

Leper (lep'ër), n. [Originally and properly leprosy, from Fr. lepre, leprosy, L. lepra, from Gr. lepra, leprosy, from lepros, scaly, lepos, a husk.] A person affected with leprosy. Lev. xiii. 45.

Lepered (lep'ërd), a. Affected with leprosy. Leporous (lep'ër-us), a. Leprous; causing leprosy.

In the porches of my ears did pour
The leperous distilment. Shak.

Lepid (lep'id), a. [L. lepidus, pleasant.] Pleasant; jocose.

Lepidium (lé-pid'i-um), n. [L.; Gr. lepidion, from lepis, lepidos, a scale.] An extensive genus of herbs or undershrubs of the nat. order Cruciferae. They are simple or usually branched, of varied habit, with small racemes of white (very rarely yellow) flowers. About sixty to eighty species are recognized, natives of warm and temperate regions throughout the world, none being alpine or arctic. L. sativum is the common garden-cress.

Lepidodendron (lep'id-ô-den-dron), n. [Gr. lepis, a shell, rind, or scale, and dendron, a tree.] An extinct genus of fossil plants of very frequent occurrence in the coal formation. The species are sometimes found of enormous size, fragments of stems occurring upwards of 40 feet in length. Their internal structure is intermediate between Coniferae and Lycopodiaceae. They preserve throughout the whole extent of the trunk the scars formed by the attachment of the petioles or leaf-stalks.

Lepidoganoid (lep'id-ô-gan-oid), n. A fish of the sub-order Lepidoganoidei.

Lepidoganoid (lep'id-ô-gan-oid), a. Of or belonging to the Lepidoganoidei.

Lepidoganoidei (lep'id-ô-gan-oid'ô-i), n. pl. [Gr. lepis, lepidos, a scale, ganos, splendour, and eidōs, resemblance.] A sub-order of ganoid fishes, distinguished from the placogonoid fishes by their external covering consisting of scales, and not, as in the latter, of plates. The best known living fishes belonging to the Lepidoganoidei are the bony pike and the polypterus. The fossil lepidoganooids begin to appear in the old red sandstone epoch, and are largely represented in the upper paleozoic strata.

Lepidogaster (lep'i-dô-gas-tër), n. Same as Lepadogaster.

Lepidoid (lep'id-oid), n. [Gr. lepis, a scale, and eidōs, form, shape, appearance.] One of the Lepidoidei, a family of extinct fossil fishes.

Lepidoidei (lep-i-doid'ë-i), n. pl. A family of extinct fossil fishes, found in the oolitic series, as also in the trias and carboniferous. The family was remarkable for its large rhomboidal bony ganoid scales, of great thickness, and covered with enamel.

Lepidolite (lep'id-o-lit), n. [Gr. lepis, lepidos, a scale, and lithos, a stone.] A mineral found in scaly masses, ordinarily of a violet or lilac colour, allied to mica. Lepidolite is of a peach-blossom red colour, sometimes gray; massive and in small concretions.

Lepidoptera (lep'id-op'tër-a), n. pl. [Gr. lepis, a scale, and pteron, a wing.] The most beautiful of all the orders of insects, Lepidoptera.

1. Butterfly—Hyperichia galathea, marbled white butterfly. 2. Hawk-moth or sphinx—Macroglossa stellatarum, humming-bird hawk-moth. 3. Moth—Abraxas grossulariata, magpie moth. 4. Palpi and spiral mouth of butterfly. 5. Antennæ—a, Butterfly; b, Sphinx; c, Moth's. 6. Portion of wing of cabbage-butterfly, with part of the scales removed. 7. Scales of do. magnified.

comprising the butterflies and moths. From the former being active by day, and the latter mostly towards twilight or at night, the butterflies are known as the diurnal, the moths as the crepuscular or nocturnal divisions. All have four membranous wings, covered more or less completely with modified hairs or scales. The mouth is entirely suctorial, the maxillæ being converted into a tube, and the mandibles rudimentary. The metamorphosis is complete. The larvæ are termed caterpillars, and are provided with masticatory organs fitted for dividing solid substances. They possess false legs in addition to the three pairs proper to the adult, and have attached to the upper lip a tubular organ or spinneret, by which silken threads can be manufactured.

Lepidopteral, Lepidopterous (lep'id-op'tër-al, lep'id-op'tër-us), a. Of or belonging to the Lepidoptera.

Lepidosiren (lep'id-o-sir'ën), n. [Gr. lepis, lepidos, a scale, and sirên, a siren.] A genus of fishes forming the order Dipnoi; the mud-fish. There are two species, the L. paradoxus and the L. annectens, the former found in the large intertropical rivers of Western Africa, the latter in the Amazon and other rivers of South America. During the dry season they lie packed in the mud of their native rivers, the peculiar nature of their respiratory organs enabling them to support this mode of existence. See DIPNOI.

Lepidosis (lep-i-dôs'is), n. [Gr. lepis, lepidos, a scale.] In med. an efflorescence of scales over different parts of the body. Called also Scale-skin.

Lepidosteidæ (lep'id-os-të'i-dë), n. pl. [See LEPIDOSTEUS.] A small family of ganoid fishes containing few species and only one genus, Lepidosteus (which see).

Lepidosteus (lep'id-os-të-us), n. [Gr. lepis, lepidos, a scale, and osteon, a bone.] A genus of fishes with bony polished or ganoid scales, and hence known by the name of bony-pikes. This genus belongs to the family Lepidosteidæ and order Ganoidi, of which it is one of the few living representatives. They are only found in North America, and resemble many of the mesozoic fossil genera more than any other living fishes.

Lepidote, Lepidotus (lep'i-dôt, lep'i-dôt-ed), a. [Gr. lepidōtos, scaly, from lepis, a scale.] In bot. covered with scurfy scaly spots; leprous.

Lepidotini (lep'i-dô-ti'ni), n. pl. [From Lepidotus.] A synonym of Lepidoidei.

Lepidotus (lep-i-dô'tus), n. [Gr. lepis, lepidos, a scale.] A fossil fish of the Wealden formation, characterized by large, thick, rhomboidal, enamelled scales, and hemispherical or obtusely conical teeth.

Lepis (lep'is), n. [Gr. lepis, a scale.] In bot. a thin flat membranous process or scale, attached by its middle, and having a lacerated irregular margin, such as covers the foliage of the oleaster.

Lepismidæ (le-pis'mi-dë), n. pl. [Gr. Lepisma, a husk, and eidōs, resemblance.] A family of wingless insects, belonging to the order Thysanura, having the abdomen fringed with a series of movable appendages, which assist the legs in locomotion, and furnished at its extremity with three caudal bristles, which are used in leaping. It includes the genera Lepisma proper and Machile. Brande.

Leporida (lé-por'i-dë), n. pl. [L. lepus, leporis, a hare, and Gr. eidōs, resemblance.] The hare tribe, or the family of rodents of which the genus Lepus is the type. The dentition is very peculiar, there being four upper incisors, two of these being small ones, situated immediately behind the normal pair.

Leporine (lep'or-in or lep'or-in), a. [L. leporinus, from lepus, a hare.] Pertaining to a hare; having the nature or qualities of the hare.

Lepped (lept), pp. Leaped. Spenser.

Lepraria (lé-pra'ri-a), n. [L. lepra, leprosy, the plants on which the species grow appearing as if affected with leprosy.] A former generic term for lichens in which the crust is broken up into a dusty mass, occasionally mixed with a few threads. The yellow powdery and white patches on the oak are examples.

Leprose (lep'rôs), a. In bot. having a scurfy appearance.

Leprosity (lé-pros'ti), n. The state of being leprous.

Leprosy (lep'rô-si), n. [O. Fr. leprosie. See LEPEE.] A name given to several different diseases. Elephantiasis is sometimes called Arabic leprosy. Regarding the leprosy of the Jews nothing certain is known. The term was probably applied to various inveterate cutaneous diseases, especially those of a chronic or contagious order. The name is now frequently restricted by medical writers to the Greek or tubercular leprosy which ch, chain; ch, Sc. lock; g, go; j, job;

h, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

prevailed during the middle ages, and is still met with in Iceland, the Orkney and Shetland Islands, Norway and Sweden, as well as in Africa, the East and West Indies, and many tropical islands. The disease is characterized by dusky red or livid tubercles of various sizes on the face, ears, and extremities; thickened or rugose state of the skin, with loss of its sensibility, falling off of the hair, excepting that of the scalp; hoarse, nasal, or lost voice; œzema, ulcerations of the surface, and extreme fetor; while in some severe cases the fingers and toes drop off. The causes of this disease are uncertain, but poor living, uncleanness, disuse of salt, and exposure to cold and damp are its constant attendants. Its cure is always uncertain, and, in advanced cases, improbable.

Leprous (lep'rus), a. [L. leprosus; Fr. lépreux. See LEPER.] 1. Infected with leprosy; covered with white scales.

His hand was leprous as snow. Ex. iv. 6.

2. In bot. covered with a sort of scurfiness, as crustaceous lichens; lepidote.

Leprously (lep'rus-li), adv. In a leprous manner.

Leprousness (lep'rus-nes), n. The state of being leprous.

Leptocardii (lep'to-kär-di-i), n. pl. [Gr. leptos, slender, and kardia, the heart.] The name given by Müller to the order of fishes comprising the lancelet, now called Pharyngobranchii.

Leptodactyl, Leptodactyle (lep-tō-dak'til), n. [Gr. leptos, slender, and daktylos, a toe.] A bird or other animal having slender toes.

Leptodactylous (lep-tō-dak'til-us), a. [Gr. leptos, slender, and daktylos, a finger.] Having slender toes.

Leptolepis (lep-to-le'pis), n. [Gr. leptos, smooth, and lepis, a scale.] A genus of small sauroid fossil fishes found in the lias and oolite.

Leptology (lep-to'lō-jī), n. [Gr. leptologia—leptos, small, and logos, discourse.] A minute and tedious discourse on trifling things.

Leptospermum (lep-tō-spēr'mum), n. [Gr. leptos, smooth, and sperma, seed.] A large genus of New Zealand and Australian trees and shrubs of the nat. order Myrtaceæ. They have small leathery dotted leaves and white flowers. Captain Cook's crew used the leaves of L. lanigerum for tea, and they are said to improve the flavour of beer.

Lepus (lē'pus), n. [L., a hare.] 1. A genus of rodents, comprising the hare and rabbit. See HARE, RABBIT.—2. In astron. the Hare, a southern constellation containing nineteen stars. It is situated directly under Orion.

Lere (lē'r), a. Empty. See LEER.

Lernæada (lēr-nē'a-dē), n. pl. A group of parasitic suctorial crustaceans, of the order Ichthyophthiria or fish-lice, having the mouth armed with piercing mandibles, and the feet, jaws, and true legs undeveloped, found attached to fishes. Some species penetrate the skin, and feed on the viscera. The typical genus is Lernæa.

Lernæan, Lernæan (lēr-nē'an), n. An individual of the group Lernæada.

Lerot (lē'rot), n. [Fr., dim. from loir, a dormouse, from L. glis, gliris, a dormouse.] A name of the garden dormouse (Myoxos nitela), a little rodent which makes great havoc among fruit. It hibernates in winter, six or seven crowding into one cell.

Lese, † n. A leash. Chaucer.

Lese, † a. [A. Sax. leas, false.] False; lying. Chaucer.

Lese, † v.t. To lose. Chaucer.

Lese Majesty (lēz' maj'es-ti), n. See LEZE MAJESTY.

Lesion (lē'zhon), n. [L. læsio, from lædo, to hurt.] 1. A hurting; hurt; wound; injury. 2. In Scots law, the degree of harm or injury done to the interests of a minor, or of a person of weak capacity, necessary to entitle him to reduce or set aside the deed by which he has suffered.—3. In pathol. derangement; disorder; any morbid change, either in the exercise of functions or in the texture of organs.

Less (les). For Unless. B. Jonson.

-Less (les). A terminating syllable appended to many nouns, and thus forming adjectives, is the A. Sax. -lessa, Goth. -laus, Icel. -laus, O. Sax. -los, O. H. G. -laos, -los, signifying literally loose from, and allied to the A. Sax. lytan, lysan, E. lose. It forms adjectives denoting destitute of, void of, wanting; as, a witless man, a man destitute of wit; childless, without children; fatherless; faithless; penniless; lawless; &c.

Less (les), a. [O. E. lesse, lasse, A. Sax. læs, lessa (for læssa). Allied to Goth. lasius, weak (comp. lazy). the superl. least is a contracted form of A. Sax. læst, læstest. Little, which serves as the positive, is from a different root.] Smaller; not so large or great; as, a less quantity or number; a horse of less size or value; we are all destined to suffer affliction in a greater or less degree.

Less (les), adv. In a smaller or lower degree; as, less bright or loud; less beautiful; less obliging; less careful; the less a man praises himself the more disposed are others to praise him.

Less (les), n. 1. Not so much; a quantity not so great as another quantity; anything below a certain standard; as, he said he would have all his rights and honours, and would not be contented with less.

And the children of Israel did so, and gathered, some more, some less. Ex. xvi. 17.

2. A younger; an inferior.

The less is blessed of the better. Heb. vii. 7.

—No less, nothing of inferior consequence or moment; nothing else.

He is no less than what we say he is. Shak.

Look for no less than death. Shak.

Less (les), v.t. To make less. Gower.

Lessee (les-sē), n. [From lease.] The person to whom a lease is given, or who takes an estate by lease.

Lessen (les'n), v.t. 1. To make less; to diminish; to reduce in size, number, degree, state, or quality; as, to lessen a kingdom or its population; awkward manners tend to lessen our respect for men of merit.—2. To degrade; to reduce in dignity; to depreciate; to disparage.

St. Paul chose to magnify his office when ill men conspired to lessen it. Atterbury.

Lessen (les'n), v.i. To become less; to shrink; to contract in bulk, quantity, number, or amount; to become less in degree; to decrease; to diminish. 'Listen to the lessening music.' Tennyson.

Lesser (les'ér), a. [A double compar. from less.] Less; smaller.

By the same reason may a man in the state of nature punish the lesser breaches of that law. Locke.

God made . . . the lesser light to rule the night. Gen. i. 16.

[The use of this form of the comparative of little is not so common as that of the form less, but it is almost uniform after the definite article, and in antithesis to greater as well as in certain special instances; as, in Lesser Asia.]

Lesser (les'ér), adv. Less.

Some say he's mad; others that lesser hate him. Shak.

Do call it valiant fury.

Lesses (les'ez), n. [Fr. laissées, lit. leaveings, from laisser, to leave.] In hunting, the ordure or excrement of the boar, wolf, and bear.

Lesson (les'n), n. [Fr. leçon; L. lectio, lectio, from L. lego, lectum, to pick up, gather, or collect, to read.] 1. Anything read or recited to a teacher by a pupil or learner, or such a portion of a book as is assigned by a preceptor to a pupil to be learned at one time; something to be learned.—2. Instruction conveyed to a pupil at one time; as, to receive twelve lessons in music; a half-hour lesson on the piano.—3. Anything learned or that may be learned from experience.

O love to love; the lesson is but plain. Shak.

4. A portion of Scripture read in divine service; as, here endeth the first lesson.—5. Precept; doctrine or notion inculcated.

Be not jealous over the wife of thy bosom, and teach her not an evil lesson against thyself. Ecclus. ix. 1.

6. Severe lecture; reproof; rebuke.

She would give her a lesson for walking so late. Sir P. Sidney.

7. A musical composition written as an exercise for an instrument.

Those good laws were like good lessons set for a flute out of tune. Sir J. Davies.

Lesson (les'n), v.t. To teach; to instruct.

Children should be seasoned betimes, and lessoned into a contempt and detestation of this vice. Sir R. L'Estrange.

Lessor (les-sor), n. [From lease.] One who leases; the person who lets to a tenant for a term of years, or gives a lease.

Lest (lest), conj. [O. E. leste, leoste, for les the, shortened from A. Sax. thý les the, the less that, lest—thý, by that—the in the more,

&c., læs=less, the, indeclinable relative.] For fear that; in case; that . . . not.

Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die. Gen. iii. 3.

Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee. Jn. v. 14.

Lest (lest), v.t. To listen. Spenser.

Lest, † n. [A form of lust.] Pleasure. Chaucer.

Leste, † v.i. To list; to please; generally used as an impersonal.

Leste, † a. Last. Chaucer.

Leste, † a. superl. Least. Chaucer.

Lestris (les'tris), n. [Gr. lêstris, piratical, from lêstēs, a robber, pirate.] A genus of palmed birds, distinguished from the true gulls by their membranous nostrils being larger, and opening nearer to the point and edge of the beak; the tail is also pointed. The L. parastictus is the arctic gull, and the L. catarrhactes the skua gull, the most formidable of all the gull kind. They both force gulls and other sea-birds to give up their prey; hence their name.

Let (let), v.t. pret. & pp. let; ppr. letting. [Common to the Teutonic languages, and originally with reduplicated preterite. A. Sax. letan, létan, pret. leót, leolt, for lelót (Goth. lailót); D. laten, Icel. lata, Goth. letan, leitán, G. lassen, to let, to permit, to let go, set free; allied to E. late, and probably to L. lassus, weary, exhausted.] 1. To permit; to allow; to suffer; to give leave or power by a positive act, or negatively to withhold restraint; not to prevent; as, a leaky ship lets water enter into the hold. Let is now always followed by the infinitive without the sign to; and the examples of its use with the infinitive preceded by to are rare even in older English.

Pharaoh said, I will let you go. Ex. viii. 28.

When the ship was caught and could not bear up into the wind, we let her drive. Acts xxvii. 15.

2. To cause; to make.

There's a letter for you, sir . . . if your name be Horatio, as I am let to know it is. Shak.

[In this sense the word let is pretty common in Old English with the infinitive not preceded by to, in constructions similar to those in which do is used with the infinitive in modern English. Thus Chaucer has—

For which this noble Theseus anon Let senden after gentle Palamon; where let senden is equivalent to did send.

See Abbott's Shakespearian Grammar, § 303.]

3. To lease; to grant possession and use for a compensation; as, to let an estate for a year; to let a house to a tenant; to let a room to lodgers: often followed by out; but the out is unnecessary.—4. To give out, as any work to be performed at a fixed rate; as, to let the work on a railway.—5. In the imperative mood, let has the following uses. (a) Followed by the first and third persons it expresses desire or wish; hence it is used in prayer and entreaty to superiors, and to those who have us in their power; as, let me not wander from thy commandments. Ps. cxix. 10. (b) Followed by the first person plural, it expresses exhortation or entreaty; as, rise, let us go. (c) Followed by the third person, it implies permission, desire, command, or concession, addressed to an inferior; as, let him go; let them remain.

Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear. Gen. i. 9.

O'er golden sands let rich Pactolus flow. Pope.

—To let alone, to leave; to suffer to remain without intermeddling; as, let alone this idle project; let me alone. Adverbially used in the sense of not to take into account; not to mention. [Colloq. or vulgar.]

He's worth a shilling a day; let alone the arrands. Dickens.

I wouldn't turn out a badger to you, let alone a man. Dickens.

—To let be, to suffer to be as at present; to suffer to go or to cease; to let alone.—To let blood, to open a vein and suffer the blood to flow out.—To let down, (a) to permit to sink or fall; to lower.

She let them down by a cord through the window. Josh. ii. 25.

(b) To soften in tempering, as tools, cutlery, &c.—To let drive or let fly, to send forth or discharge with violence, as an arrow, stone, &c.—To let go, to allow or suffer to go; to release from confinement; to relax hold of anything: often, by a vulgar corruption, with of.

'Don't,' cried Oliver, struggling. 'Let go of me.'

—To let in or into, (a) to permit or suffer to enter; to admit; as, open the door, let in my friend; we are not let into the secrets of the cabinet. (b) To place in as an insertion. (c) To cheat. Hallwell.—To let loose, to free from restraint; to permit to wander at large.—To let off, (a) to allow to escape; to release, as from a penalty or an engagement. (b) To discharge, as an arrow; to fire, as a gun.—To let out, (a) to suffer to escape. (b) To loosen; to extend; to enlarge; as, to let out a rope (by allowing it to slip); to let out a sail or a garment. (c) To lease or let to hire. (d) To give on contract. See above def. 4.—To let slide, to let alone; not to mind; to pay no more attention to.

Let the world slide: sessa! Shak.

—To let slip, to let go; to let loose; to omit; to lose by negligence.—Let that flee stick to the wa', let that alone; say nothing about that. [Scotch.]—To let well alone, to forbear trying to improve that which is already in a satisfactory condition; to leave matters as they are.

Let (let), v.i. 1.† To forbear; to leave off.

That man is bounden to his observance
For Goddes sake to lets of his will. Chaucer.

When Collatine unwisely did not let
To praise the clear unmatched red and white. Shak.

2. To be offered for hire; as, a house to let. 3. To yield a certain rent by being hired out; as, this house lets for £50 a year.—To let in, to leak; to admit water.—To let on, to make a disclosure; to betray knowledge; as, don't let on about that; that is, don't mention it. [Colloq.]

Let (let), n. A letting for hire.

Till this coach-house . . . gets a better let, we live here cheap. Dickens.

Let (let), v.t. pret. & pp. letted; ppr. letting. [A. Sax. lettan, to delay, to hinder, from læt, late; comp. hinder, from hind.] To retard; to hinder; to impede; to interpose obstructions to.

Mine ancient wound is hardly whole,
And lets me from the saddle. Tennyson.

Let (let), n. A retarding; hinderance; obstacle; impediment; delay.

And hath set
Us young immortals, without any let,
To watch his slumber through. Keats.

—Let (let). A diminutive termination of nouns; as, hamlet, a little house; rivulet, a small stream. It is from French let, with l interposed, which is also recognized as a diminutive, hence let is properly a double diminutive.

Let-abe (let-a-bē), n. Let alone; forbearance: used chiefly in the phrase let-abe for let-abe, forbearance for forbearance; mutual forbearance. [Scotch.]

Letch (lech), n. [See following verb.] An almost stagnant ditch. [Provincial.]

Letch (lech), v.t. [A. Sax. leccan, to wet, to moisten. See LEAK.] To wash, as ashes, by percolation, or causing water to pass through them, and thus to separate from them the alkali. The water thus charged with alkali is called lye. Written also Leach.

Letch (lech), v.i. To pass through by percolation. Written also Leach.

Letch (lech), n. 1. A quantity of wood ashes through which water leches or passes, and thus imbibes the alkali.—2. A leech-tub.

A name given somewhat loosely to the countries, or more especially the maritime parts of the countries, lying on the eastern portion of the Mediterranean and its contiguous waters, as Turkey, Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, Egypt, &c.—2. An easterly wind blowing up the Mediterranean; a levanter.

Levant (lë-vant'), v. i. [Sp. levantar, to raise, to move, to remove; levantar la casa, means to break up house; levantar el campo, to break up camp; to decamp—from L. levare, to raise.] To run away; to decamp.

Her unfortunate affliction precluded her from all hope of levanting with a lover. Trollope.

Levant (lë-vant'), n. A land-spring. [Local.] 'Land-springs which we call levants.' Gilbert White.

Levanter (lë-vant'ër), n. The name given to an easterly wind blowing up the Mediterranean from the direction of the Levant.

Violent Levanters which the learned among us say ought to be the Euroclydon which drove St. Paul to Malta. W. H. Russell.

Levanter (lë-vant'ër), n. One who levants; one who bets at a horse-race, and runs away without paying the wager lost; any one who runs away disgracefully. [Slang.]

Levantine (lë-vant'in or lev'an-tin), a. 1. Pertaining to the Levant. 'The levantine churches.' Spencer.—2. Designating a particular kind of silk cloth.

Levantine (lë-vant'in or lev'an-tin), n. 1. A native or inhabitant of the Levant.—2. A vessel belonging to the Levant.—3. A particular kind of silk cloth.

Levari facias (lë-vä'ri fä'shi-as), n. [L., that you cause to be levied.] In law, a writ of execution executed by the sheriff for levying money upon the goods and lands of another. It issues from the county court and other inferior courts, except when money due for taxes, upon recognizances, &c., is to be levied, in which case it issues from the exchequer. This writ, except in the case of outlawry, has been completely superseded by the writ of elegit.

Levation (lë-vä'shon), n. [L. levatio, levationis, from levo, to raise.] The act of raising; elevation. Sir T. More.

Levator (lë-vä'tër), n. [L. from levo, to raise.] 1. In anat. a name applied to many muscles, such as raise the lips, eyelids, eye, soft palate, shoulder-blade, &c.—2. A surgical instrument used to raise a depressed part of the skull.

Leve (lëv), v. t. To believe.

Leve (lëv), v. i. To live.

Leve, a. [See LIFE.] Dear; beloved.

Leveel, Levesell, n. [Written also Lefesal, Lefsale, &c., from A. Sax. leaf, a leaf, and sal, sel, a hall, a room; comp. Dan. löval, Sw. löfsal, a hut of green branches.] 1. A lattice.—2. A pent-house or projecting roof over a door, window, &c.—3. An open shed.

He looketh up and down til he hath found
The clerke's hors, there as he stood ybound
Behind the mille under a leveell. Chaucer.

Levee (lev'é), n. [Fr. levée, a gathering or levying, a levy, the breaking up of a meeting, an embankment, from lever, to raise, L. levo. The French word does not appear ever to have had the meaning which levee commonly has in English, lever being the proper French word for this meaning.]

1. A morning reception held by a prince or great personage; a morning assembly. The term is chiefly applied in this country to the stated public occasions on which the sovereign receives visits from such persons as are entitled by rank or fortune to the honour. It is distinguished from a drawing-room in this respect, that while at the former gentlemen alone appear (with the exception of the chief ladies of the court), both ladies and gentlemen are admitted to the latter. In the United States, the term is applied to any general or miscellaneous assemblage of guests, usually in the evening; as, the president's levee.—2. The act or time of rising. Johnson.—3. [Borrowed from the use of the word by the French settlers.] In America, an embankment on the margin of a river, to confine it within its natural channel, as—the levees on the banks of the Mississippi.—Levee en masse. See LEVY.

Levee (lev'é), v. t. 1. To attend the levee of; to hunt or pursue at levees. [Rare.]

Warm in pursuit, he levees all the great. Young.

2. To embank; as, to levee a river.

Level (lev'el), n. [A. Sax. læfel, from L. libella, a line or other appliance for testing whether a surface is level, from libra, a balance, a plummet, a level. The A. Sax. læfel no doubt merged in the O. Fr. level, livel (now niveau), also from L. libella.]

1. An instrument by which to find or draw a straight line parallel to the plane of the horizon, and by this means to determine the true level or the difference of ascent or descent between several places, for various purposes in architecture, agriculture, engineering, hydraulics, surveying, &c. There is a great variety of instruments for this purpose, differently constructed and of different materials, according to the particular purposes to which they are applied, as the carpenter's level, mason's level, gunner's level, balance level, water level, mercurial level, spirit level, surveying level, &c. All such instruments, however, may be reduced to three classes:—(1) Those in which the vertical line is determined by a suspended plumb line or balance weight, and the horizontal indicated by a line perpendicular to it. Such are the carpenter's and mason's levels. (2) Those which determine a horizontal line by the surface of a fluid at rest, as water and mercurial levels. (3) Those which point out the direction of a horizontal line by a bubble of air floating in a fluid contained in a glass tube. Such are spirit-levels, which are by far the most convenient and accurate. All levels depend on the same principle, namely, the action of terrestrial gravity.—2. A line or surface every point of which is equally distant from the centre of the earth: called a true level.—3. A line or surface which coincides with or is parallel to the plane of the horizon: called an apparent level.—4. A surface without inequalities.—5. Rate; standard; usual elevation; customary height; as, the ordinary level of the world.—6. Equal elevation with something else; a state of equality.

Providence, for the most part, sets us upon a level. Addison.

7. The line of direction in which a missile weapon is aimed. 'The level of mine aim.' Shak.

I stood i' the level
Of a full-charged confederacy, and give thanks
To you that choked it. Shak.

Fäte, fär, fat, fäll; më, met, hér; pîne, pin; nôte, not, möve; tûbe, tub, bull;

oil, pound; ü, Sc. abune; y, Sc. fey.

8. Rule; plan; scheme.

Be the fair level of thy actions laid. Prior.

9. Fixed or settled position; natural position; position to which anything is entitled. 'When merit shall find its level.' F. W. Robertson.—10. In mining, an excavation or cutting in a lode; a horizontal gallery in a mine; levels are generally ten, twenty, thirty fathoms below the adit, in which case they are called the ten fathoms, twenty fathoms, &c. level.

Level (lev'el), a. 1. Horizontal; coinciding with the plane of the horizon, or parallel to it; as, to be perfectly level is to be exactly horizontal.—2. Not having one part higher than another; not ascending or descending; even; flat; having no inequalities of magnitude; as, a level plain or field; level ground; a level floor or pavement.—3. Even with anything else; of the same height; on the same line or plane.

Now shaves with level wing the deep, then soars Up to the fiery concave towering high. Milton.

The setting sun now beams more mildly bright, The shadows lengthening with the level light. Scottie.

4. Equal in rank or degree; having no degree of superiority.

Be level in preferences, and you will soon be as level in your learning. Bentley.

Level (lev'el), v.t. pret. & pp. levelled; ppr. levelling. 1. To make horizontal; to reduce to a horizontal plane.—2. To make smooth or even; to reduce or remove inequalities of surface in anything; as, to level a road or walk.—3. To reduce or bring to the same height with something else; to lay flat; to reduce to an even surface or plane.

And their proud structures level with the ground. Sandys.

He levels mountains, and he raises plains. Dryden.

4. To reduce to equality of condition, state, or degree; as, to level all ranks and degrees of men.

The consequence has been (in too many physical systems), to level the study of nature, in point of moral interest, with the investigations of the algebraist. Stewart.

5. To point, in taking aim; to elevate or depress so as to direct a missile weapon to an object; to aim; as, to level a cannon or musket.

Against the eastern gate of Paradise Levelled his evening rays. Milton.

Hence—6. To aim; to direct; as, severe remarks levelled at the vices and follies of the age.—7. To adapt; to suit; to proportion; as, to level observations to the capacity of children.—To level up, to raise something that is low to the level of anything higher; specifically, to raise a lower person or class to the level of a higher.—To level down, to lower to the same level or status.

Level (lev'el), v.i. 1. To accord; to agree; to suit. [Rare.]

Such accommodation and besort As levels with her breeding. Shak.

2. To be in the same direction with something; to be aimed.

He to his engine flew, Plac'd near at hand in open view, And rais'd it till it levelled right, Against the glow-worm tail of kite. Hudibras.

3. To point a gun or an arrow to the mark; as, he immediately levelled and fired.—4. To direct the view or purpose; to make attempts; to aim.

The glory of God and the good of his church . . . ought to be the mark whereto we also level. Hooker.

Ambitious York did level at thy crown. Shak.

5. † To conjecture; to attempt to guess. 'He levelled at our purposes.' Shak.

Level-coil (lev'el-kōil), n. An old Christmas game in which each hunted the other from his seat, the loser giving up his seat to the winner; hence, riotous sport of any kind.

Young Justice Bramble has kept level-coil Here in our quarters, stole away our daughter. B. Fensou.

Levelless, † a. Without leave. Chaucer.

Levelism (lev'el-izm), n. The act or principles of levelling distinctions in society. [Rare.]

Leveller (lev'el-ēr), n. 1. One who levels or makes even.—2. One who destroys or attempts to destroy social distinctions and reduce all men to equality.

You are an everlasting leveller; you won't allow encouragement to extraordinary merit. Collier.

Its structure strongly proves the truth of the maxim that princes are true levellers—real republicans—among themselves. Brougham.

[The term Levellers was particularly given to a party which arose in the army of the Long Parliament about the year 1647. They professed a determination to level all ranks and establish an equality in titles and estates throughout the kingdom. They were put down by Fairfax.]

Levelling (lev'el-ing), n. 1. The reduction of uneven surfaces to a level or plane.—2. The art or operation of ascertaining the different elevations of objects on the surface of the earth; the art or practice of finding how much any assigned point on the earth's surface included in a survey is higher or lower than another assigned point. It is a branch of surveying of great importance in making roads, determining the proper lines for railways, conducting water, draining low grounds, rendering rivers navigable, forming canals, and the like. In ordinary cases of levelling (for example, for canals, railways, &c.) the instruments commonly employed are a spirit-level with a telescope attached to it, and a stand for mounting them on, and a pair of levelling staves.

Levelling-pole, Levelling-rod (lev'el-ing-pōl, lev'el-ing-rod), n. Same as Levelling-staff.

Levelling-staff (lev'el-ing-staf), n. An instrument used in levelling in conjunction with a spirit-level and telescope. It is variously constructed, but consists essentially of a graduated pole with a vane sliding upon it so as to mark the height at any particular distance above the ground. In levelling two of them are used together, and being set up at any required distance the surveyor, by means of a telescope placed between them perfectly horizontally, is enabled to compare the relative heights of the two places. Called also Levelling-pole, Levelling-rod, Station-pole, or Station-staff.

Levelly (lev'el-li), adv. In a level manner; evenly.

Levelness (lev'el-nes), n. The condition of being level; evenness; equality.

Leven (lev'n), n. See LEAVEN.

Levent (lev'en), n. Lightning. See LEVIN.

Leven (lev'en), n. A lawn; an open space between woods. [Scottish.]

Lever (lē'vēr), n. [Fr. levier, from lever, L. levo, to raise.] 1. [In mech.] A bar of metal, wood, or other substance turning on a support called the fulcrum or prop, and used to overcome a certain resistance (called the weight) encountered at one part of the bar by means of a force (called the power) applied at another part. It is one of the mechanical powers, and is of three kinds, viz.: (1) When the fulcrum is between the weight and the power, as in the handspike, crowbar, &c. In this case the parts of the lever on each side of the fulcrum are called the arms, and these arms may either be equal as in the balance, or unequal as in the steelyard. (2) When the weight is between arms of an obstetrical forceps.—4. In dentistry, an instrument used in extracting the stumps of teeth.—Compound lever, a machine consisting of several simple levers combined together and acting on each other.—Lever escapement, in a watch, an escapement in which the pallets are affixed to a bar or lever vibrating on its centre and having at one end a notch or fork which catches a pin connected with the balance-wheel and drives this pin backwards and forwards so as to give the balance-wheel its reciprocal motion.—Lever watch, a watch with a lever escapement.—Universal lever, a contrivance by means of which the reciprocating motion of a lever is made to communicate a continuous rotatory motion to a wheel, and a continuous rectilinear motion to anything attached by a rope to the axle of the wheel.

Lever (lē'vēr), a. compar. of lefe, lief, or lene. [See LIEF.] More agreeable.

Lever (lē'vēr), adv. Rather; more gladly; more willingly.

Shalt thou never eat nor drink, said the steward, Till my lord be come to town?

I make mine avow to God, said Little John, I had lever to crack thy crown. Old ballad.

Leverage (lē'vēr-āj), n. 1. The action of a lever; the arrangement by which lever power is gained. 'The fulcrum of the leverage.' 1. Taylor.—2. Lever power; the mechanical advantage or power gained by using a lever.

Lever-board (lē'vēr-bōrd), n. See LOUVER.

Leveret (lē'vēr-et), n. [Fr. levrette, dim. of O. Fr. levre (now lievre), a hare, from L. lepus, leporis, a hare.] A hare in the first year of its age.

Leverock (lē'vēr-ok), n. A lark. See LARK.

Lever-valve (lē'vēr-valv), n. A safety-valve kept down by the pressure of an adjustable weight. In locomotives a spring is substituted for the weight, and the pressure is regulated by a screw and indicated on a brass plate.

Levesell, † n. See LEVECEL.

Levet, † (lē'vēt), n. [Fr. lever, to raise, to call up.] The morning call on the trumpet by which soldiers are summoned to rise; a reveille.

Come, sir, a quaint levet To waken our brave general. Bens. & Fl.

Leveth, † v.t. imper. second pers. pl. Leveth me, believe me. Chaucer.

Levable (lev'i-a-bl), a. That may be levied; that may be assessed and collected; as, sums leviable by law.

Leviathan (lē'vī-a-than), n. [Heb. livyāthān, a term which etymologically seems to mean a long jointed monster.] 1. An aquatic animal described in the book of Job, ch. xli., and mentioned in other passages of Scripture. In Isaiah it is called the crooked serpent. It is not known what animal is intended by the writers, whether the crocodile, the whale, or a species of serpent.—2. A fabulous sea-monster of immense size.

Lever (lē'vēr), n. One who levies.

Levigable (lev'i-ga-bl), a. That can be rubbed or ground down to fine powder.

Levigate (lev'i-gāt), v.t. pret. and pp. levigated; ppr. levigating. [L. levigo, from levis, smooth.] 1. In phar. and chem. to rub or grind to a fine impalpable powder; to make fine, soft, and smooth.—2. To plane; to polish. 'When use hath levigated the organs.' Barrow.

Levigate (lev'i-gāt), a. 1. Made smooth, as if by polishing.—2. Made less harsh or burdensome; alleviated. 'His labours being levigated, and made more tolerable.' Sir T. Elyot. [Rare.]

Levigation (lev-i-gā'shon), n. The act or operation of grinding or rubbing a solid substance to a fine impalpable powder.

Levin (lev'in), n. [O.E. levene, levening, &c., from or allied to A. Sax. lig, lige, flame, ligen, flaming, E. leme, leam, flame. The connection between levin and A. Sax. lig, ligen, is similar to that between leel, log and Dan. lov, law, leel, skog, Dan. skov, a wood, E. laugh, and its present pronunciation lif; the connection between it and leme power of acting at A, the weight or resistance at W, C being the fulcrum or prop. Fig. 2 is a lever of the second kind, fig. 3 a lever of the third kind. In all levers the power and weight are inversely proportional to the perpendicular lines drawn from the fulcrum to the directions in which the two forces act.—2. A watch with a lever escapement; a lever watch.—3. In surg. one of the

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

ch, chain; ch, Sc. loch; g, go; j, job;

n, Fr. ton; ng, sing; th, then; th, thin;

again is paralleled by Icel. himinn and hifinn, E. heaven, Sw. hamn, Icel. höfn, E. haven.] Lightning. Spenser.

To him, as to the burning levin,
Short, bright, resistless course was given.
Sir W. Scott.

Levin-brand (lev'in-brand), n. A thunder-bolt. Spenser.

Levine (lě'vin), n. See LEVYNE.

Leviner (lev'in-ēr), n. A swift species of hound.

Levirate, Leviratical (lev'i-rāt, lev-i-rat'-ik-al), a. [L. levir, a husband's brother.] In Jewish antiqu. (a) a term applied to the law according to which a woman whose husband died without issue was to be married to the husband's brother. Deut. xxv. 5. (b) Made in accordance with the levirate law.

The first-born son of a leviratical marriage was reckoned and registered as the son of the deceased brother.

Dean Alford.

Leviration (lev-i-rā'shon), n. The act or custom among the Jews of a man's marrying the widow of a brother who died without issue. The same custom or law prevails in some parts of India.

Levitation (lev-i-tā'shon), n. [From L. levitas, lightness, from levis, light.] 1. The act of making light; lightness; buoyancy.

The lungs also of birds, as compared with the lungs of quadrupeds, contain in them a provision distinguishingly calculated for this same purpose of levitation. Falcy.

2. Among Spiritualists, the alleged phenomenon of bodies heavier than air being by spiritual means rendered buoyant in the atmosphere.

Levite (lě'vit), n. [From Levi, one of the sons of Jacob.] 1. In Jewish history, one of the tribe or family of Levi; a descendant of Levi; more particularly, one of those persons who were employed in various duties connected with the tabernacle, or afterwards with the temple, as in bringing wood and other necessities for the sacrifices, singing and playing in connection with the services, &c. They were subordinate to the priests, the descendants of Aaron, who was also of the family of Levi.—2. A priest; so used in contempt or ridicule.

A young Levite . . . might be had for his board, a small garret, and ten pounds a year. Macaulay.

Levitic, Levitical (lě-vit'ik, lě-vit'ik-al), a. 1. Belonging to or connected with the Levites.—2. Priestly. 'Certain theological, or rather levitical, questions.' Milton.—Levitical degrees, degrees of kindred within which persons are prohibited to marry. They are set forth in Lev. xviii. 6-18.

Levittically (lě-vit'ik-al-li), adv. After the manner of the Levites.

Leviticus (lě-vit'ik-us), n. [From Levi, Levite.] A canonical book of the Old Testament, the third book of Moses, containing principally the laws and regulations relating to the priests and Levites and to offerings; the body of the ceremonial law.

Levity (lev'i-ti), n. [L. levitas, from levis, light.] 1. Lightness; the want of weight in a body compared with another that is heavier; as, the ascent of a balloon in the air is owing to its levity.—2. Lightness of temper or conduct; want of due consideration; want of seriousness; disposition to trifle; inconstancy; changeableness; unsteadiness; fickleness; capriciousness; volatility; as, the levity of youth.

The levity that is fatigued and disgusted with everything of which it is in possession. Burke.

Levoglucoſe, Lævoglucoſe (lě-vō-glū-kōs), n. In chem. a sugar isomeric with dextroglucose, but distinguished from it by turning the plane of polarization to the left, and always occurring along with it in honey, and in many fruits, and in other sacchariferous vegetable organs. The mixture of these two sugars in equal numbers of molecules constitutes fruit-sugar or inverted sugar, which itself turns the plane of polarization to the left, the specific rotatory power of levoglucoſe being greater than that of dextroglucose.

If the analyser (a slice of quartz) has to be turned towards the right, so as to cause the colours to succeed each other in their natural order—red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, violet—the piece of quartz is called right-handed, or dextrogyrate. If, however, the analyser has to be turned from right to left to obtain the natural order of colours, the quartz is called left-handed or levogyrate, the two kinds of polarization respectively called right-handed circular polarization and left-handed circular polarization.

Haydn.

Levulose, Lævulose (lě'vū-lōs), n. One of the constituents of fruit-sugar or inverted sugar.

Under the influence of dilute acids, or long boiling with water, cane-sugar is converted into what is called inverted sugar, a mixture of dextrose and levulose. It is called inverted, because the left-handed rotation of the levulose is greater than the right-handed rotation of the dextrose. Haydn.

Levy (lev'i), n. [Fr. levée, a raising or levying, a levy of troops or taxes, &c., from lever, L. levo, to raise.] 1. The act of raising, enlisting, or collecting, especially for public service; as, a levy of troops.—2. That which is levied, as a body of troops, or the amount accruing from a tax.

And king Solomon raised a levy out of all Israel; and the levy was thirty thousand men. 1 Ki. v. 13.

And this is the reason of the levy which king Solomon raised; for to build the house of the Lord, and his own house, &c. 1 Ki. ix. 15.

3. In law, the act of collecting on execution.—Levy in mass [Fr. levée en masse], the act of levying for military service all the able-bodied men of a country.

Levy (lev'i), v.t. pret. & pp. levied; ppr. levying. [From the noun, and perhaps partly directly from the Fr. lever.] 1. To raise; to collect; as, to levy troops; to levy taxes.

Edward the First covenanted in express terms for himself and his heirs, that they would never again levy any aid without the assent and good-will of the estates of the realm. Macaulay.

2. In law, (a) to erect or construct; as, to levy a mill; to levy a ditch. (b) To take or seize on execution or by seizure or distress.—3.† To raise or desist from, as a siege.

Euphrator having levied the siege from this one city, forthwith led his army to Demetrias. Holland.

—To levy war is to raise or begin war, to take arms for attack; to attack.—To levy a fine, to commence and carry on a suit for assuring the title to lands or tenements.

Levyne (lev'in), n. [So called from Levy the crystallographer.] A mineral found in Ireland, Faroe, and some other places. It occurs crystallized, the primary form being an acute rhomboid. It is a hydrated silicate of calcium and aluminum.

Lew (lū), a. [Allied to D. laarw, G. low, lukewarm; comp. also A. Sax. hleowan, to be warm.] Tepid; lukewarm. [Old and provincial.]

Lewd (lūd), a. [O.E. lewed, lewd, lay, ignorant; A. Sax. leowed, lewed, &c., lay, laic, pp. of leowan, to weaken, enfeeble. Skeat.] 1.† Lay; laic; not clerical; unlearned; ignorant; simple.

So these great clerks their little wisdom shew
To mock the lewd, as learn'd in this as they.
Sir J. Davies.

2. Vile; despicable; profligate; wicked. But the Jews which believed not, . . . took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, . . . and assaulted the house of Jason. Acts xvii. 5.

Great numbers of men were trained up in an idle and dissolute way of life, . . . and then, if not ashamed to beg, too lewd to work, and ready for any kind of mischief. Southey.

3. Given to the unlawful indulgence of lust; addicted to fornication or adultery; dissolute; lustful; libidinous.—4. Proceeding from unlawful lust; as, lewd actions.—SYN. Lustful, libidinous, licentious, profligate, dissolute, sensual, unchaste, impure, lascivious, lecherous.

Lewdly (lūd'li), adv. In a lewd manner: (a)† ignorantly; foolishly. Spenser. (b)† Grossly; coarsely; wantonly; wickedly.

Whom she with leavings lewdly did miscall
And wickedly backbite. Spenser.

Yet lewdly darest our ministering upbraid. Milton. (c) With the unlawful indulgence of lust; lustfully.

Lewdness (lūd'nes), n. The state or quality of being lewd: (a)† ignorance; folly. (b)† Wickedness. (c) The unlawful indulgence of lust; fornication or adultery; lasciviousness. SYN. Lasciviousness, impurity, unchastity, debauchery, lechery, licentiousness, sensuality, profligacy.

Lewdsby† (lūds'bi), n. A lewd or lecherous person.

Lewdster† (lūd'stēr), n. One given to criminal indulgence of lust; a lecher.

Against such lewdsters and their lechery
Those that betray them do no treachery. Shak.

Lewed† a. Ignorant; unlearned; lascivious. Chaucer.

Lewis, Lewisson (lū'is, lū'is-son), n. 1. The name of one kind of shears used in cropping woollen cloth.—2. An instrument of iron used in raising large stones to the upper part of a building. It operates by the dovetailing of one of its ends into an opening in the stone, so formed that no vertical force can detach it. In the figure a are two movable parts, perforated at their heads to admit the pin or bolt c. These are inserted by hand into the cavity formed in the stone, and between them the part b is introduced, which pushes their points out to the sides of the stone, thus filling the cavity; e is a half-ring bolt with a perforation at each end, to this the tackle above is attached by a hook. The fastening pin passes horizontally through all the holes, entering at the right side d, and forelocking on the other end c.

Lewis.

zontally through all the holes, entering at the right side d, and forelocking on the other end c.

Lex (leks), n. [L. from same root as E. to lie.] Law; a word used in various law phrases; as, lex loci contractus, the law of the place where the contract is made; lex talionis, the law of retaliation, directing the punishment to be analogous to the crime, as an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, &c.; lex non scripta, the unwritten or common law; lex scripta, the written or statute law; lex mercatoria, mercantile law.

Lexical (leks'ik-al), a. Pertaining to a lexicon.

Librarianship (lī-brā'ri-an-ship), n. The office of a librarian.

Library (lī'bra-ri), n. [L. librarium, a book-case, libraria, a bookseller's shop, from liber, a book. See LIBEL.] 1. A collection of books belonging to a private person or to a public institution or a company. 'A list of his majesty's library.' Walpole.—2. An apartment or suite of apartments, or a whole building appropriated to the keeping of a collection of books.

Librate (lī'brāt), v.t. pret. & pp. librated; ppr. librating. [L. libro, liberum, from libra, a balance, a level—whence E. level.] To hold in equipoise; to poise; to balance.

Librate (lī'brāt), v.t. To move, as a balance; to be poised.

Their parts all librate on too nice a beam. Clifton.

Libration (lī-brā'shon), n. 1. The act of librating or balancing, or state of being librated or balanced; a state of equipoise, with equal weights on both sides. 'The libration and frequent weighing of his wings.' Jer. Taylor.—2. In astron. a real or apparent libratory motion like that of a balance before coming to rest.—Libration of the moon, an apparent irregularity of the moon's motion, whereby those parts very near the border of the lunar disc alternately become visible and invisible, indicating, as it were, a sort of vibratory motion of the lunar globe. The libration of the moon is of three kinds: (a) libration in longitude, or a seeming vibratory motion according to the order of the signs; owing to this circumstance, that the motion of the moon about her axis is not always precisely equal to the angular velocity in her orbit; (b) libration in latitude, in consequence of her axis being inclined to the plane of her orbit, so that sometimes one of her poles and sometimes the other declines as it were, or dips towards the earth; (c) diurnal libration, which is simply a consequence of the lunar parallax. In this case an observer at the surface of the earth perceives points near the upper edge of the moon's disc, at the time of her rising, which disappear as her elevation is increased; while new ones on the opposite or lower edge, that were before invisible, come into view as she descends towards the horizon. If the observer were placed at the earth's centre he would perceive no diurnal libration.—Libration of the earth, a term applied by some of the older astronomers to that feature of the earth's motion by which while revolving in its orbit its axis constantly continues parallel to itself.

Libratory (lī'bra-to-ri), a. Balancing; moving like a balance, as it tends to an equipoise or level; oscillating.

Libretto (lī-bret'tō), n. [It., a little book.] 1. A book containing the words of an extended musical composition, as an opera, oratorio, and the like.—2. The words themselves.

Hall*.—2. One who has license to practise any art or to exercise any profession. Thus there are licentiates of the Royal College of Surgeons, in dental surgery, &c. Among Presbyterians it is a person authorized by a presbytery to preach and eligible for a pastoral charge.—3. The position of such person.

Licentiate (lī-sen'shi-āt), v.t. To give license or permission to; to encourage by license.

We may not hazard either the stifling of generous inclinations, or the licentiating of anything that is coarse. St. R. L'Estrange.

Licentiation (lī-sen'shi-āt-shon), n. The act of licentiating or permitting. [Rare.]

Licentious (lī-sen'shus), a. [L. licentiosus, from licentia, license.] 1. Characterized by or using license; indulging too great freedom; overpassing due bounds or limits; excessive.

Where shall we find a parallel in the whole compass of the Bible for such a licentious abuse of personification? R. Hall.

Specifically.—2. Unrestrained by law, religion, or morality; wanton; loose; dissolute; libidinous; as, a licentious person; licentious desires.—SYN. Unrestrained, ungoverned, uncontrolled, unruly, riotous, ungovernable, wanton, profligate, dissolute, lax, loose, sensual, impure, unchaste, lascivious, immoral.

Licentiously (lī-sen'shus-ly), adv. In a licentious manner; in contempt of law and morality; lasciviously; loosely; dissolutely.

Licentiousness (lī-sen'shus-nes), n. The state of being licentious; licentious conduct; want of due restraint; dissoluteness; profligacy; as, his licentiousness is notorious.

Immoderate assurance is perfect licentiousness.

Shenstone.

Lich† (lich), a. [See LIKE.] Like; even; equal.

For both to be and seem to him was labour lich. Spenser.

Lich† (lich), n. [A. Sax. leo, a dead body; G. leiche, a corpse; Goth. leik, Icel. lik, D. lijk, the body. Hence lichwake, lykewake, watching with the dead; lich-gate, a shed at the church-gate to rest the corpse under; Lich-field, the field of corpses.] A dead body; a corpse.

Lichen (lī'ken or lich'en), n. [Gr. leichen.]

1. In bot. one of an order of cellular cryptogamic plants without stem and leaves, and consisting mainly of a thallus. Lichens, like algae, are nourished through their whole surface by the medium in which they live, which in the case of the former is air. Reproduction generally takes place by spores, but in circumstances unfavourable to the production or development of thecae and spores they are propagated by gonidia. They appear in the form of thin flat crusts, covering rocks and the barks of trees, or growing upon the ground, or in foliaceous expansions, or branched like a shrub in miniature, or sometimes only as a gelatinous mass or a powdery substance. They are called rock-moss and tree-moss, and some of the liverworts are of this order. They also include the Iceland-moss and reindeer-moss; but they are entirely distinct from the true mosses (Musci). Lichens abound in the cold and temperate parts of the world. The greater part are of no known use except in preparing the surface of the earth for the reception of larger vegetables; but some are used as tonic medicines, as Varicolaria faginea, and Iceland-moss (Cetraria islandica), when deprived of its bitterness by boiling becomes a diet recommended to invalids.

Their principal use is to furnish the dyer with brilliant colours—archil, cudbear, and several others are thus employed.—2. In med. an eruption of papule, of a red or white colour, either clustered together or disseminated over the surface of the skin, with or without fever, or derangement of the digestive organs, usually terminating in slight desquamation, and very liable to recur.

Lichen (lī'kend or lich'end), a. Relating to or covered with lichens.

Lichenic (lī-ken'ik or lich'en'ik), a. Relating to or derived from lichens; as, lichenic acid.

Licheniform (lī-ken'ī-form or lich'en'ī-form), a. Resembling a lichen. H. Spencer.

Lichenin, Lichenine (lī-ken-in or lich'en-in), n. (C₁₂H₁₀O₅). A peculiar vegetable product, isomeric with starch, sometimes called Lichen Starch. It is obtained from liverwort and Iceland-moss, and is stated to possess the alkaline property of combining with acids.

Lichenographic, Lichenographical (lī-ken-ō-graf'ik or lich'en-ō-graf'ik, lī-ken-ō-graf'ik-al or lich'en-ō-graf'ik-al), a. Pertaining to lichenography.

The question may be licitly discussed.

Licitness (lis'it-nes), n. The state or quality of being licit; lawfulness.

Lick (lik), v. t. [A. Sax. liccian, D. liken, Dan. like, G. lecken, Goth. laigon, in blai-gon, represented in the kindred tongues by Ir. lighim, L. lingo, Gr. leicho, Skr. lîh, Slav. lisati, lokati, Lith. laizyti, to lick; allied also to L. ligurio, to lick, to feast by stealth. Hence, according to Diez, li. liceare (from O.H.G. leccôn), Fr. liquar, licher, Fr. lécher. Comp. lecher, lickerish, which are also from this stem. Some forms beginning with s seem closely allied, as D. slikken, to swallow; Dan. slikke, Icel. sleikja, Prov. E. and Sc. slake, slait, to lick, to smear. With regard to lick, Gr. leicho, and similar forms, Pott remarks—'It would be useless for any one to say that in the conjunction of l, the most mobile of the linguals, with a following guttural (l-k, l-g, l-x) there is not present—I do not say a conscious, but certainly a kind of instinctive intentionality. By the l is sensuously represented the contact of the lips with an article of food or drink, while the guttural calls up the act of swallowing that follows.' 1. To pass or draw the tongue over the surface; as, a dog licks a wound.—2. To lap; to take in by the tongue; as, a dog or cat licks milk.—3. [See under noun, 5.] To strike repeatedly for punishment; to flog; to chastise with blows; to beat; to conquer. [Colloq.]

It is not so sure that he licked the François.

—To lick up, to devour; to consume entirely.

Now shall this company lick up all that are round about us, as the ox licketh up the grass of the field.

Num. xxii. 4.

—To lick the dust, (a) to be slain; to perish in battle.

His enemies shall lick the dust. Ps. lxxii. 9.

(b) To act abjectly and servilely. Wit that can creep, and pride that licks the dust.

Pope.

—To lick into shape, to give form or method to, from the notion that the young bear is born shapeless and its mother licks it into shape.

A bear's a savage beast, of all most ugly and unnatural;
Whelp'd without form, until the dam
Has lick'd it into shape and frame. Hudibras.

—To lick the spittle of, to fawn upon with servility; to court by flattery or attentions; to be meanly servile to. 'Need not herd themselves with the rabble, nor lick the spittle of great ones.' South.

Lick (lik), n. 1. A rubbing or drawing of the tongue over anything.—2. A slight smear or coat, as of paint. 'A lick of court whitewash.' Gray.—3. [Scotch.] A small quantity; as much as can be taken up by the tongue; as, a lick of sugar, of oatmeal.—4. In America, a place where salt is deposited at salt springs, and where animals come to lick it.—5. [In this sense Wedgwood derives the word from W. lach, a slap; but it is probably the same as in the preceding senses with an extended meaning.] A blow; a stroke.—6. pl. [Scotch.] A beating.

An' monie a fallow gat his licks. Burns.

Licker (lik'ér), n. One that licks or laps up; one that beats.

Lickerish (lik'ér-ish), a. [Written also lickerous, licorous, liquorish, &c., and ultimately from the stem lick, probably through A. Sax. liccera, a glutton, or through the allied lecher, lecherous. See LECHER, and comp. G. lecker, lickerish, dainty, delicate, and as noun a dainty person.] 1. Nice in the choice of food; dainty; as, a lickerish palate. 2. Eager or greedy to swallow; eager to taste or enjoy; having a keen relish.

It is never tongue-tied when fit commendation, whereof womankind is so lickerish, is offered unto it. Sir P. Sidney.

3. Tempting the appetite; dainty. Wouldst thou seek again to trap me here
With lickerish baits, fit to ensnare a brute?
Milton.

4. Lecherous; salacious. R. Browne.
Lickerishly (lik'ér-ish-li), adv. In a lickerish manner; daintily.

Lick-trencher (lik'trensh-ér), n. Same as Lick-platter. Cornhill Mag.

Licorice (lik'or-is), n. Same as Liquorice.

Licorouse (lik'or-us), a. Same as Lickerish.
Licorousest (lik'or-us-nes), n. Same as Lickerishness.

Lictor (lik'tér), n. [L.; from obs. L. liceo, to summon.] An officer among the Romans, who bore an axe and fasces or rods as ensigns of his office. The duty of a lictor was to attend the chief magistrates when they appeared in public, to clear the way for them, and cause due respect to be paid them, also to apprehend and punish criminals.

Lictors and rods, the ensigns of their power. Milton.

Lid (lid), n. [A. Sax. hlið, gehlið, hlið, lid, cover, protection; D. lid, O. Fris. hlið, lid, O.H.G. hliit, G. lid, lied, as in avenge-lid, an eyelid; Icel. hlið, a gate or gateway, an interval. Allied to L. claudo, to shut, Gr. kleis, a key; Skr. lud, to cover.] A cover; as, (a) that which shuts the opening of a vessel or box; as, the lid of a chest or trunk. (b) The cover of the eye, the membrane which is drawn over the eyeball of an animal at pleasure, and is intended for its protection; the eyelid (which see). (c) In bot. the operculum or cover of the spore-cases of mosses; also, a calyx that falls off from the flower in a single piece.

Lidget (lij), n. Same as Ledge. Spenser.

Lidless (lid'les), a. Having no lid; uncovered, as the eye, with the lids; hence, sleepless, vigilant. 'A lidless watcher of the public weal.' Tennyson.

Lie (li), n. [A. Sax. lyge, lyge, a lie, from leogan, to lie; Icel. lygi, D. logen, leugen, G. lüge, a lie. See the verb.] 1. A criminal falsehood; a falsehood uttered for the purpose of deception; an intentional violation of truth.

It is wilful deceit that makes a lie. A man may act a lie, as by pointing his finger in a wrong direction, when a traveller inquires of him his road.

Paley.

2. A fiction.

The truth is moral, though the tale a lie. Dryden.

3. Anything that misleads or disappoints one, as false doctrine and the like.

Wishing this lie of life were o'er. Trench.

—To give the lie to, to charge with falsehood; to prove to be false; as, he gave him the lie direct; a man's actions may give the lie to his words.

Men will give their own experience the lie. Locke.

SYN. Falsehood, untruth, fiction, deception.

Lie (li), v. t. pret. & pp. lied; ppr. lying. [A. Sax. leogan, D. liegen, Goth. liugan, Icel. lyga, O.H.G. liugan, G. lügen, to lie; comp. Gael. leog, idle talk.] To utter falsehood with an intention to deceive; to say or do that which deceives another when he has a right to know the truth, or when morality requires a just representation.

Inform us, will the em'porer treat?
Or do the prints and papers lie? Swift.

Lie (li), v. t. pret. lay; pp. lain (lient); ppr. lying. [A. Sax. liegan, to lie, of which leagan, to lay, is a causative; O. and Northern E. and Sc. ligge, lig; Goth. liagan, D. liggen, Dan. ligge, Icel. ligga, G. liegen, to lie. See LAW.] 1. To occupy a horizontal or nearly horizontal position; to rest lengthwise, or to be flat upon the surface of anything; to be placed and remain without motion; as, he is lying in bed; the book lies on the table; to this meaning the sense of being dead often attaches.

Her lily hand her rosy cheek lies under. Shak.

To lie in cold obstruction and to rot. Shak.

2. To lay or place one's self in a horizontal or nearly horizontal position: often with down.

Lie down; lay thine ear close to the ground and list if thou canst hear the tread of travellers. Shak.

3. To rest in an inclining posture; to lean; to recline; as, he is lying against the wall of the house.—4. To be at rest; not to stir.

The wind is loud and will not lie. Shak.

5. To be situated; to have place or position; as, Ireland lies west of England.—6. To be posted or encamped, as an army; as, the troops lying before Sebastopol.

The English lie within fifteen hundred paces. Shak.

Somewhat similar is the meaning to take up a posture of defence.

Here I lay and thus I bore my point. Shak.

7. To reside; to dwell; to sojourn; to lodge; to sleep.

The virtuous lady, Countess of Auvergne, . . .

By me entreats, great lord, thou wouldst vouchsafe

To visit her poor castle where she lies. Shak.

Mr. Quinion lay at our house that night. Dickens.

8. To be confined as in prison.

I will deliver you or else lie for you. Shak.

9. To remain or be in some condition; to continue: followed by some word or phrase denoting the particular condition; as, to lie waste; to lie fallow; to lie open; to lie hid; to lie pining or grieving; to lie under one's displeasure; to lie at the mercy of a creditor, or at the mercy of the waves.—10. To be present or contained; to be found; to exist: often followed by in.

In my loyal bosom lies his power. Shak.

Envy lies between beings equal in nature, though unequal in circumstances. Jeremy Collier.

He that thinks that diversion may not lie in hard labour, forgets the early rising of the huntsman.

Locke.

11. To depend; to have results determined by: followed by in; as, our success lies in vigilance.—12. To weigh; to press.

His faults lie gently on him. Shak.

13. To be sustainable in law; to be capable of being maintained; as, an action lies against the tenant for waste.

An appeal lies in this case. Ch. J. Parsons.

—To lie along, to lean over with a side wind, as a ship.—To lie over the land, to keep a course nearly parallel to the land.—To lie at one's heart, to be an object of affection, desire, or anxiety.

The Spaniards have but one temptation to quarrel with us, the recovering of Jamaica, for that has ever lien at their hearts. Sir W. Temple.

—To lie by, (a) to be reposit or remaining with; as, he has the manuscript lying by him. (b) To rest; to intermit labour; as, we lay by during the heat of the day. (c) Naut. To remain near, as one ship to another at sea.—To lie hard or heavy, to press; to oppress; to burden.

Thy wrath lieth hard upon me. Ps. lxxxviii. 7.

He that commits a sin shall find

The pressing guilt lie heavy on his mind. Creech.

[Shakspeare has to lie heavy to.

It would unclog my heart

Of what lies heavy to 't.]

—To lie in, to be in childbed.—To lie in a person, to be in the power of; to belong to. As much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men. Rom. xii. 18.

—To lie in the way, to be an obstacle or impediment; as, remove the objections that lie in the way of an amicable adjustment.—To lie in wait, to wait for in concealment; to lie in ambush; to watch for an opportunity to attack or seize.—To lie on or upon: (a) to be a matter of obligation or duty; as, lies on the plaintiff to maintain his action. (b) To depend on. 'As if his life lay on it.'

Shak.—To lie on hand, to be or remain in possession; to remain unsold or undisposed of; as, great quantities of wine lie on hand, or have lain long on hand.—To lie on one's hands, (a) to remain unsold. (b) Not to require to be expended in employment; hence, to be tedious; as, men are sometimes at a loss to know how to employ the time that lies on their hands.—To lie on the head of, to come on; to fall to the share of.

What he gets more of her than sharp words, let it lie on my head. Shak.

—To lie over, (a) to remain unpaid after the time when payment is due, as a note in bank. (b) To be deferred to some future occasion, as a motion or resolution in a deliberative assembly.—To lie to, to be stationary, as a ship. A ship is said to lie to when her progress is checked, either by counterbalancing the yards or taking in sail.—To lie to one's work, to exert all one's strength or powers in the performance of one's work.

So many workers; and no mercenary mock workers, but real ones that lie freely to it; each patriot stretches himself against the stubborn glebe; hews and wheels with the whole weight that is in him. Carlyle.

—To lie under, to be subject to; to suffer; to be oppressed by.—To lie with, (a) to lodge or sleep with. (b) To have carnal knowledge of. (c) To belong to; as, it lies with you to make amends.

Lie, Lay. Lay is a transitive verb, and has for its preterit laid; as, he told me to lay it down, and I laid it down. Lie is intransitive, and has for its preterit lay; as, he told me to lie down, and I lay down. Some persons blunder by using laid for the preterit of lie; as, he told me to laid down, and I laid down. So persons often say, the ship laid at anchor; they laid by during the storm; the book laid on the shelf, &c. It is only necessary to remember, in all such cases, that laid is the preterit of lay and not of lie. This would save many respectable writers from a gross error which seems to be increasing among us. Goodrich.

Lie (lî), n. 1. The relative position of one object with regard to another, or with regard to a point of the compass; as, I don't know the lie of the country. Hence.—2. Situation, position, or state, as of an affair.—3. In geol. the manner in which strata are disposed.—4. See LYE (in railways).

Lie (lî), n. Same as Lye.

Lie-a-bed (lî'a-bed), n. One who lies long in the morning.

David was none of your lie-a-beds. Charles Reade.

Lieberkühn (lê-ber-kü'n-an), a. [After Lieberkühn, who first observed the glands by aid of a lens.] In anat. appellation of certain simple secreting cavities thickly distributed over the intestines, called Lieberkühn's glands.

Lief (lîef), a. [O.E. lefe, leve, A. Sax. leof, loved, beloved; D. liep, Icel. ljúfr, G. lieb, Goth. liubs, loved. Akin love.] 1. Dear; beloved; pleasing; agreeable.

Yet now I charge thee quickly go again As thou art lief and dear. Tennyson.

2. Willing; pleased; glad.

He up arose, however lief or loth. Spenser.

Liefst (lîf), n. One loved or beloved; a friend. 'Liefest lief.' Spenser.

Lief (lîef), adv. Gladly; willingly; freely: used in familiar speech, as in the phrase, I had as lief go as not. Had in such a phrase is perhaps a corruption of would, arising from the two words being both contracted into 'd in such phrases as I'd, he'd; but this is very doubtful. See HAVE.

Myself would work eye dim, and finger lame, Far lief than so much discredit him. Tennyson.

I'd much liefer be well-born Than boast the wealth of Cæsus. Prof. Blackie.

Liggement (lij'ment), n. In arch. same as Ledgement.

Ligger (lig'ēr), n. The horizontal timber of a scaffolding; a ledger.

Light (lit), n. [A. Sax. leoht, light, light, light; O. Sax. O. H. G. liohht, leoht, D. and G. licht, Icel. ljós, Dan. lys, Goth. liurhath; allied to L. lux, homen, light, lucio, to shine, lumen, the moon; Gr. leukos, white, leusō, to see; W. llug, Gael. leus, light; Skr. loch, to shine, to see.] 1. That agent or force in nature by the action of which upon the organs of sight objects from which it proceeds are rendered visible. The several views which have been entertained respecting the nature of light may be ranged under two heads—the system of emission and the system of undulation. The former, adopted and perfected by Newton, supposes light to consist of minute particles emitted by luminous bodies and travelling through space with immense rapidity till they reach the eye; the latter supposes that objects are rendered visible by vibrations excited by luminous bodies in an elastic imponderable medium named ether, pervading all space and filling up the intervals between the molecules of ponderable bodies. The former is called the Newtonian or corpuscular theory; the latter, which is that now universally accepted, the undulatory or wave theory. The language, however, which is employed in treating of light is, for the most part, accommodated to the former. The velocity of light is astonishing, as it passes through a space of nearly 12,000,000 miles in a minute.—2. That from which such an agent or force emanates, or is supposed to emanate; that object or body which renders other objects or bodies distinct, clear, or visible to the eye of the observer, as the sun, the moon, a star, a light-house, a candle, a match, and the like.

Then he called for a light, and sprang in. Acts xvi. 29.
And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night. Gen. i. 16.

Hence—3. Fig. something which metaphorically resembles such an object in making distinct, clear, or visible; knowledge; information; especially, the source of moral or religious enlightenment; mental or spiritual illumination; also, a person who is conspicuous or noteworthy; a model or example; as, the lights of the age.

He shall never know
That I had any light from thee of this. Shak.

4. The physical conditions or phenomena determining the visibility of objects; the phenomena constituting day; the dawn of day; space or area that is illuminated; hence, open view; a visible state or condition; public observation; publicity.

O, spring to light! auspicious Babe, be born! Pope.

Came but a while on liking here. Dryden.

3. Inclination; pleasure; desire; satisfaction; as, this is an amusement to your liking; often with for or to.

A person who cannot build a house or a carriage will decide for himself whether a house or a carriage is built to his liking. Sir G. C. Lewis.

He who has no liking to the whole, ought in reason to be excluded from censuring the parts. Dryden.

Lilac (li'lak), n. [Sp. lilac, Ar. lilak, li'lik, li'ac; Per. lilaj, ilanj, ilang, nilah, the indigo-plant, from nil, indigo, Skr. nila, blue, nilam, indigo.] A plant of the genus Syringa, the S. vulgaris, nat. order Oleaceae, a beautiful and fragrant-flowered shrub, a native of Persia, but now completely acclimatised in this country. There are several varieties with flowers of different colours.

Lilacine (li'lā-sin), n. In chem. the bitter principle of the lilac.

Lilaceous (li-lī-ā-sē-e), n. pl. [L. lilium, a. lily.] A large natural order of endogenous plants, many of which are the most beautiful of the vegetable world. They are stemless herbs, or shrubs with a simple or branched trunk, with bulbous or fasciated roots. They have six hypogynous or perigynous stamens, with usually introrse anthers; a three-celled ovary, each cell being usually many-ovuled, an entire style, and a capsular fruit. They are much more abundant in temperate climates than in the tropics, where they chiefly exist in an arborescent state. The lily, fritillary, hyacinth, star of Bethlehem, tulip, dragon-tree, squill, aloe, onion, garlic, &c., belong to this order. The Smilacaceae, Colchicaceae, and Asparagaceae are by modern writers united with the Liliaceae.

Liliaceous (li-lī-ā-s'us), a. [L. lilaceous, from lilium, a. lily.] Pertaining to the order of plants Liliaceae or to lilies; lily-like.

With scraps of thundrous epic lilted out
By violet-headed doctors. Tennyson.

Lilt (lilt), n. Something played or sung; a song; a tune; an air.

Lily (li'lī), n. [A. Sax. lile, lilige, L. lilium, Gr. leirion.] 1. The English popular name of a genus of plants (Lilium), nat. order Liliaceae. There are many species, as the white lily, orange lily, tiger-lily, scarlet lily, &c., all herbaceous perennials with scaly bulbs, whence arise tall slender stems, furnished with alternate or somewhat whorled leaves, and bearing upon their summit a number of erect or drooping flowers of great beauty and variety of colours, having a perianth of six distinct or slightly cohering segments. Many foreign species have been introduced into this country, some of which are quite hardy, while others require to be cultivated in greenhouses. The Japanese lily (L. auratum) grows out of doors, but is better under glass. It is one of the noblest flowering plants in existence, and highly fragrant. L. giganteum grows to the height of 12 ft.—

White Lily (Lilium candidum).

Lily of the valley, a plant of the genus Convallaria, with monopetalous, bell-shaped flowers, divided at the top into six segments. See CONVALLARIA.—2. The end of a compass which points to the north: so called from being frequently ornamented with a lily or fleur-de-lis.

Limb-meal† (lim'mel), a. [Lat. limmaeum, limb by limb—lim, a limb, and meal, a portion.] Limb from limb; in pieces.

O that I had her here, to tear her limb-meal.
Shak.

Limbo (lim'bö), n. [It. from L. limbus, a hem or edge.] 1. In scholastic theol. a region beyond this world in which the souls of those who have not offended by personal acts are detained till the final judgment. Two or more of such regions are sometimes mentioned, more especially a limbus patrum and a limbus infantum, the former of which designates that place referred to in 1 Pet. iii. 19, where our Saviour spoke to the spirits in prison, and where the souls of good men before the coming of our Saviour were confined, the latter of which designates the place or condition of infants who die without baptism.—2. Any similar region apart from this world. Shakspeare seems to apply the term to hell itself. Ariosto makes it the place of all lost things.

As far from help as limbo is from bliss. Shak.

A limbo large and broad, since called
The Paradise of Fools. Milton.

3. A prison or other place of confinement. [Slang or colloq.]

Lime (lim), n. [A. Sax. līm, any matter that causes adhesion, as lime, glue, cement; D. līm, glue, leera, clay; Icel. līm, lime, glue; G. leim, glue, lehm, clay. Allied to E. loam, L. limus, slime, Slr. li, to be viscous.] 1. A viscous substance, sometimes laid on twigs for catching birds; bird-lime (which see).

You must lay lime to tangle her desires. Shak.

2. A most useful caustic earth, obtained by exposing chalk and other kinds of limestones or carbonates of lime to a red heat—an operation generally conducted in kilns constructed for the purpose, by which the carbonic acid is expelled, and lime more or less pure, according to the original quality of the limestone, remains, in which state it is called quicklime. The metallic base of lime is calcium (which see), of which it is the protoxide (CaO). When it is required of great purity it is prepared by strongly heating pure carbonate of lime, such as Iceland-spar or Carrara marble. It is a brittle, white, earthy solid, the specific gravity of which is about 2.3. It phosphoresces powerfully when heated to full redness. It is one of the most infusible bodies known. It has a powerful affinity for water, and when water is sprinkled upon it it becomes very hot, and crumbles down into a dry powder, called slaked lime or hydrate of lime. The carbonate of lime is a most abundant natural product, and is found pure in the varieties of calcareous spar and statuary marble. Chalk and several varieties of limestone are also nearly pure carbonates of lime. The salts of lime, as the nitrate, sulphate, phosphate, oxalate, &c., several of which exist native, are generally obtained by dissolving carbonate of lime in the respective acids. Chloride of lime, or bleaching powder, is obtained by exposing hydrate of lime to chlorine, and when this is dissolved in water it forms bleaching liquid. The most important application of lime is in the manufacture of mortar and other cements used in building; it is also extensively used as a manure to fertilize land.

Lime (lim), n. [A. Sax. līm, līnde, O.E. lynde, līnde, līnd, D. and G. līnde, Dan. Sw. Icel. līnd. The word in English became line, then probably lim.] But Wedgwood thinks the tree received its name from the glutinous or limy juice of the young shoots, which with the buds he thinks may have been boiled down for bird-lime.] The English name of the genus Tilia, nat. order Tiliaceæ. They are fine trees, with soft wood, more or less heart-shaped and serrate leaves, and small cymes of cream-coloured fragrant flowers hanging on an axillary peduncle, which is united to a leaflike bract. The common lime or linden tree is the T. europæa. It is a large and handsome tree, and its timber, though soft and weak, is valuable for many purposes. Mats are made of the fibres of the inner bark, which is called bast. The American lime-tree or bass-wood (T. americana) resembles the European species.

Lime (lim), n. [Fr. lime, from Per. limō, limān, whence also lemon.] 1. A species of Citrus, the C. Limetta. It is cultivated in the south of Europe, and produces an inferior sort of lemon. See CITRUS.—2. The acid fruit produced by the Citrus Limetta; it is used for flavouring punch, sherbet, and similar drinks.

Linn (lin'), v.t. [Fr. enluminer, L. illuminare, to illuminate. See ILLUMINATE, LUMINOUS, &c.] To draw or paint; specifically, to paint in water colours; to illuminate, as a book or parchment with figures, ornamental letters, and the like.

Let a painter linn out a million of faces and you shall find them all different. Sir T. Browne.

Limnæa, Limnea (lim-nē-ā), n. [Gr. limnæos, marshy, from limnē, a marsh, pool, or fen.] A genus of pulmoniferous fresh-water univalves. The shell is ovato-conical or tur-reted. See LIMNÆADÆ.

Limnæadæ, Limnæidæ (lim-nē-ā-dē, lim-nē-ī-dē), n. pl. [See LIMNÆA.] The pond-snails, a family of fresh-water, univalve, inoperculate, gasteropodous molluscs, having a lung sac instead of gills. The shell is spiral, elongated, thin, translucent, the body whorl large, the aperture rounded in front, and the columella obliquely twisted. They have the power of floating on their back, the foot forming a kind of boat. They are found in all parts of the world, and occur fossil, especially in the Wealden. The genus Limnæa is the type.

Limner (lim'nēr), n. One who limns; the old term for an artist or delineator, but chiefly restricted to one who painted portraits or miniatures.

Limnite (lim'nīt), n. 1. A fossil species of the genus Limnæa.— 2. Yellow ochre or brown iron ore, containing more water than limonite. Composition: oxide of iron 74.8, water 25.2.

Limnoria (lim-nō-ri-a), n. A genus of isopodous crustaceans which feed on wood, and are most destructive to piers, dock-gates, ships, and other wood-work immersed in water.

Limonin, Limonine (lī'mon-in), n. (C₂₂H₄₀O₁₃.) A bitter crystallizable matter found in the seeds of oranges, lemons, &c.

Limonite (lī'mon-īt), n. [Gr. leimón, a meadow.] An iron ore which is found earthy, concretionary, or mamillary, and fibrous, the fibres radiating in the prisms. Its brownish-yellow streak distinguishes it from the hematite. It is found in mesozoic and tertiary deposits, as well as forming the bog-iron of existing marshes. Its colour varies from dark brown to ochre yellow. It consists of sesquioxide of iron 85.6, water 14.4.

Limosa (lī-mō'sa), n. [L. limus, slime.] A genus of wading birds, frequenting marshes and the sea-shore; the godwits. See GODWIT.

Limose (lī'mōs), a. Same as limous.

Limosella (lī-mō-sel'la), n. [From L. limus, mud: in allusion to the habitation of the species.] A genus of humble aquatic annual plants, nat. order Scrophulariaceæ. L. aquatica, or mudwort, is a British plant which is widely spread throughout the world. It has creeping stems, with clusters of narrow leaves and small pink flowers, and grows in muddy places.

Limosinæ (lī-mō-sī'nē), n. pl. [L. limosus, slimy, from limus, slime.] A sub-family of grallatorial birds of the family Scolopacidae; the godwits.

Limosis (lī-mō'sis), n. [Gr. limos, hunger.] In med., a ravenous appetite caused by disease.

Pluck the lined crutch from thy old limping sire. Shak.

Limp (limp), n. A halt; act of limping.

Limp (limp), a. [See the verb, also LIMBER.] 1. † Vapid; weak. Jz. Walton.— 2. Easily bent; flexible; pliant; lacking stiffness; flaccid.

His hooks were starched, but his white neckerchief was not; and its long limp ends straggled over his closely-buttoned waistcoat in a very uncouth and unpicturesque fashion. Dickens.

Limper (limp'ēr), n. One who limps.

Limpet (limp'et), n. [O. Fr. limpine, a limpet; comp. Gr. lepas, lepasos, a limpet.] A cyclobranchiate gasteropodous mollusc of the genus Patella, adhering to rocks. This adhesion is effected partly by the suctional powers of its broad disc-like foot, and partly by a strong glutinous secretion given off by the mucous follicles and canals of the foot. Most commonly the limpet is found ensconced in a shallow pit excavated out of the rock, and which it has made or rasped out by the siliceous particles embedded in its foot. From this pit the limpet, when covered by the tide, makes short journeys in quest of its food, which consists of algae, and which it eats by means of a long ribbon-like tongue covered with numerous rows of hard teeth. The common species (Patella vulgata) is used as bait, and is eaten by the poorer classes of Scotland and Ireland. In tropical seas they attain an immense size, one species having a shell about a foot wide.

Limpid (lim'pid), a. [L. limpidus; allied to

Gr. lampō, to shine.] Characterized by clearness or transparency; as, a limpid stream.—SYN. Clear, transparent, pellucid, lucid, pure, crystal, translucent.

linguistics; a student of philology; a linguist.

Though he (Chaucer) did not and could not create our language (for he who writes to be read does not write for linguists), yet it is true that he first made it easy, and to that extent modern. J. R. Lowell.

Linguistic, Linguistical (ling-gwis'tik, ling-gwis'tik-al), a. Relating to language or to the affinities of language. 'Linguistic knowledge.' Wedgwood.

Linguistics (ling-gwis'tiks), n. The science of languages, or of the origin, significations, affinities, and application of words; also called Comparative Philology. 'The modern science of linguistics, or comparative grammar and etymology.' G. P. Marsh.

A work containing a complete chronological account of English lexicography and lexicographers would be a most acceptable addition to linguistics and literary history. S. W. Singer.

Lingula (ling'gü-la), n. [L., dim. of lingua, a tongue.] A genus of molluscs of the class Brachiopoda and family Lingulidæ, a family that has survived with but little change since the early Silurian period. These molluscs are one of the few examples of pe-dunculated bivalve shells. It has two long cliated arms, which are curled up during repose. The members of the genus inhabit the Indian Archipelago and the Australa-sian seas.

Lingulate (ling'gü-lät), a. [L. lingulatus, from lingula, tongue.] Shaped like the tongue or a strap; ligulate.

Lingy (lin'li), a. [In first sense perhaps allied to long. In second sense comp. Prov.
E. lingge, to work hard.] 1. Tall; limber; flexible.—2. Active; strong; able to bear fatigue. [A provincial word.]

Lingerous (li-nijér-us), a. [L. linum, flax, and gero, to bear or carry.] Bearing flax;
producing linen.

Liniment (lin'i-ment), n. [L. linimentum, from lino or linio, to besmear, to anoint.]
In med. a species of soft ointment; a composition of a consistence somewhat thinner than an unguent, but thicker than oil. The term is also applied to spirituous and other stimulating applications for external use.

Linin, Linine (lín'in), n. The crystallizable bitter principle of Linum catharticum, or purging-flax.

Lining (lín'ing), n. 1. The act of covering on the inside.—2. The covering of the inner surface of anything, as of a garment, a box, a wall, or the like; as, the pleura is the lining of the thorax.

Was I deceived, or did a sable cloud
Turn forth her silver lining on the night? Milton.

3. That which is within; contents.

The lining of his coffers shall make coats
To deck our soldiers. Shak.

Lining (lín'ing), n. The act of measuring,
as of land with a line; a fixing of boundaries;
specifically, permission granted by a dean of guild to erect or alter a building according to specified conditions. [Scottch.]

Link (link), n. [A. Sax. hlenca, Sw. länk, Dan. lenke, Icel. hlekk, a link, a chain;
allied to G. gelenk, a joint or joining, a link, from lenken, to bend, gelenk, supple, pliable.] 1. A single ring or division of a chain.—2. Anything doubled and closed together like a link. 'A link of horsehair.'
Mortimer.—3. Anything which serves to connect one thing or one part of a thing with another; any constituent part of a connected series; as, links in a train of evidence. 'Love, the common link.' Dryden.
'To burst all links of habit.' Tennyson.

The thread and train of consequences in intellectual ratiocination is often long, and chained together by divers links. Sir M. Hale.

4. In land-measuring, a division of Gunter's chain, having a length of 7·92 inches. The chain is divided into 100 links, and is 66 feet in length. 100,000 square links make an imperial acre.—5. A sausage; so called from sausages being made in a continuous chain.
[Provincial English].—6. In mach. any straight rod connecting two rotating pieces by flexible joints.—7. In a steam-engine, the link-motion.—8. A crook or winding of a river; the ground lying along such a winding; as, the links of the Forth. [Scottch.]

Link (link), v.t. To unite or connect by, or as if by, a link or links; to unite by something intervening; to unite in any way; to couple; to join. 'To a radiant angel linked.'
Shak. 'Link towns to towns with avenues of oak.' Pope. 'And creature link'd to creature, man to man.' Pope.

They're so linked in friendship,
That young prince, Edward marries Warwick's daughter. Shak.

Link (link), v.i. To be connected; to be joined in marriage; to ally one's self.

Now, Warwick, tell me, even upon thy conscience,
Is Edward your true king? for I won't be loath
To link with him that were not lawful chosen. Shak.

All the productions of the earth link in with each other. Burke.

Link (link), n. [Origin quite uncertain.
Some connect it with Gr. lychnos, a light, a lamp; Wedgwood connects it with D. lonte, lomp, a gunner's match of twisted tow (See LUNT); others connect it with link, from the parts being doubled or linked together.]
A torch made of tow or hards, &c., and pitch.
The fact that such links were used to restore the colour of hats by smoking them explains the following passage in the Taming of the Shrew:—

Nathaniel's coat, sir, was not fully made,
And Gabriel's pumps were all unpink'd the heel;
There was no link to colour Peter's hat.

Link (link), v.i. To walk smartly; to trip; to do anything smartly and quickly. [Old and Northern English or Scotch.]

Linkboy, Linkman (link'boy, link'man), n. A boy or man that carries a link or torch to light passengers.

Link-motion (link'mô-shon), n. Motion communicated by links, applied especially Link-motion.

to a system of gearing for working the valves of a locomotive-engine. In the accompanying cut A is the rod by which the slide-valve is worked, and by which, accordingly, the admission of steam to the cylinder is regulated; B, the reversing rod, which is fixed to a cross-bar, one end of which is joined by means of another rod to a runner, which slides up and down in the slit of the curved piece, and which is also joined to the rod
A. The curved piece is the link, and is joined near the extremities to the rods of two eccentrics, an inner and an outer.
When the driver of the engine pushes forward the rod B the runner is raised to the top of the link, and therefore follows the motions of the upper end of the link, and places the slide-valve rod under the control of the inner eccentric. When he pushes it back he similarly places the rod under the control of the outer eccentric, which reverses the engine.

Links (links), n. pl. [A. Sax. hlinc, high land, a ridge of land left unploughed, a balk; the south of England form is linch, a balk, a bank forming a boundary, &c.] A stretch of flat or slightly undulating ground on the sea-shore, often in part sandy and covered with bent-grass, furze, &c.; often with a good sward of grass on part of it at least. [Scottch.]

Link-work (link'wérk), n. Mechanism in which links, or intermediate connecting pieces, are used to transmit motion from one part to another.

Linn (lin), n. See LIN.

Linnæa (lin-né'a), n. A genus of plants of the nat. order Caprifoliaceæ. It contains but one species (L. borealis), a creeping evergreen plant found in woods and in mountainous places in Scotland and other northern countries, as well as in North America. Its trailing stems bear small dark-green leaves in pairs, and send up erect flower-stalks which divide into two at the top, each branch bearing a beautiful drooping fragrant pink flower. The plant was an especial favourite with Linnaeus, and was named in honour of him by Gronovius.

Linnæan Linnean (lin-né'an), a. Pertaining to Linnaeus, the celebrated botanist.—
Linnean system, in bot. the system of classification introduced by Linnaeus, in which the classes are founded upon the stamens, and the orders upon the pistils.

Linnet (lin'net), n. [A. Sax. lînet; Fr. linot, linotte, from L. linum, flax.] A small singing bird of the genus Fringilla. It is one of the commonest of British birds, everywhere frequenting open heaths and commons, and breeding in the furze and other bushes.
They are cheerful and lively birds, and very sweet and pleasing songsters. Called also provincially Lintie and Lintwhite.

Linoleum (lī-nō'le-um), n. [L. linum, flax, and oleum, oil.] 1. A preparation of linseed-oil with chloride of sulphur, by which it is rendered solid and useful in many ways. When rolled into sheets it is used as a substitute for india-rubber or gutta-percha; dissolved it is used as a varnish for waterproof textile fabrics, table-covers, felt carpets, and the like; as a paint it is useful both for iron and wood, and for ships' bottoms; as a cement it possesses some of the qualities of glue; vulcanized or rendered hard by heat it may be carved and polished like wood for mouldings, knife-handles, &c.; and mixed with ground cork and pressed upon canvas it forms floor-cloth.—2. The floor-cloth thus produced.

Linous (lī'nus), a. Relating to or in a line. Sir J. Herschel.

Lin-pin (līn'pin), n. Same as Linchipin.

Linsang (līn'sang), n. The Linsang gracilis, a pretty animal allied to the civets, a native of Java and Malacca.

Linseed, Lintseed (līn'sēd, līnt'sēd), n. The seed of lint or flax.

Linseed-cake (līn'sēd-kāk), n. The solid mass or cake which remains when oil is expressed from flax-seed. It is much used as food for cattle and sheep. Called also Oil-cake.

Linseed-meal (līn'sēd-mēl), n. The meal of lint or flax seed; it is used for poultices.

Linseed-oil (līn'sēd-oil), n. A yellow oil procured by pressure from the seed of lint or flax. It is much used as a vehicle for colours by painters, in the manufacture of linoleum, &c.

Linsey (līn'sī), n. [O.E. līn, linen, and term.-sey, comp. linsey, flansy.] Cloth made of linen and wool; linsey-woolsey.

Linsey-woolsey (līn'sī-wūl'sī), n. 1. Stuff made of linen and wool; light coarse stuff. 2. Anything unsuitably mixed; a motley composition; jargon; gibberish.

What linsey-woolsey hast thou to speak to us again?

Linsey-woolsey (līn'sī-wūl'sī), a. 1. Made of linen and wool mixed.—2. Of different and unsuitable parts; neither one thing nor another; vile; mean.

A lawless linsey-woolsey brother,
Half of one order, half another. Hudibras.

Lintstock (līn'stok), n. [For lintstock—lint, a match for firing cannon, and stock for stick.] A pointed staff with a crotch or fork at one end to hold a lighted match, used in firing cannon.

And the nimble gunner
With lintstock now the devilish cannon touches,
And down goes all before them. Shak.

Lint (līnt), n. [A. Sax. līnet, L. linteum, lin-teus, from linum, flax. Līne, līnen, have the same origin.] 1. Flax.—2. Linen scraped into a soft substance, and used for dressing wounds and sores.

Lintel (līnt'el), n. [O. Fr. līntel, Fr. līnteau, from L.L. līntellus, dim. from L. līnes, a limit or boundary, there being probably a confusion with līmen, a threshold.] In arch. a horizontal piece of timber or stone over a door, window, or other opening, to discharge the superincumbent weight.

Lintie (līnt'ī), n. A līnnet. [Scotch.]

But I dinna see the broom Wi' its tassels on the lea,
Noy hear the lintie's sang
O' my ain countrie. R. Gilfillan.

Lint-scraper (līnt'skrāp-ēr), n. A young surgeon. Thackeray. [Slang.]

Lintseed, n. See LINSEED.

Lintwhite (līnt'whī), n. A līnnet.

Her song the lintwhite swellets. Tennyson.

Linum (lī'num), n. [L., flax.] A genus of plants which gives its name to the nat. order Linacēæ; flax. There are about eighty species, herbs or rarely small shrubs, chiefly found in the temperate and warmer extra-tropical regions of both hemispheres. Few are of any importance, except the flax plant (L. usitatissimum). (See FLAX.) Three species grow wild in Britain, the most important of which is L. catharticum (purg-flax), a small slender plant growing in damp meadows and fields and chalky pastures, having small drooping white flowers. It is bitter, purgative, and diuretic.

Lion (lī'on), n. [O. E. leōn, lygon, &c., A. Sax. līo, leo, leon, Fr. līon, from L. leo, leōnis; Gr. leōn.] 1. A quadruped of the genus Felis. F. leo, the largest and most majestic of all carnivorous animals, distinguished by its tawny or yellow colour, a full flowing mane in the male, a tufted tail, and the disappearance of the feline markings in both sexes before they arrive at maturity. The largest lions are from 8 to 9 feet in length. The lion is a native of Africa and the warm regions of Asia. He preys chiefly on live animals, avoiding carrion, unless impelled by intense hunger. He approaches his prey with a stealthy pace, crouching when at a proper distance, when he springs upon it with fearful velocity and force, emitting at the same time so terrible a roar that his victim seems paralyzed before it is struck. The whole frame is extremely muscular, the foreparts being particularly so, giving with the large head, flashing eye, and copious mane, a noble appearance to the animal, which has led to his being called the 'king of beasts'; and to fancies of its noble and generous nature which have no real foundation. Of the African lion there are several varieties, as the Barbary lion, Gambian lion, Senegal lion, Capellion. The Asiatic varieties are generally distinguished as the Bengal lion, the Persian or Arabian lion, and the maneless lion of Gujerat. The American lion is the puma (Felis concolor).—2. A sign in the zodiac; Leo. 3. In her, a frequent charge in coat-armour. The attitudes are various, as rampant, passant, regardant, gardant, couchant, salient, sejant, &c. The lion is the symbol of the British nation, and is borne in the royal arms, of which it forms one of the supporters, and a lion passant gardant, or surmounts the arms as crest.—4. An object of interest and curiosity; as, the lion of the day; to visit the lions of the place. [This use of the term is derived from the lions kept as objects of curiosity in the Tower of London.]

Such society was far more enjoyable than that of Edinburgh, for here he was not a lion but a man. Prof. Wilson.

—Lion's provider, (a) a popular name for the jackal (which see). (b) Any humble friend or follower who acts as a tool, sycophant, or foil to another.—Lion's share, the whole or a disproportionate share of the advantages of a contract claimed by one of the parties, and supported by the right of the strongest: a phrase derived from Esop's fable of the lion, fox, &c., hunting together, and applied to cases where most of what is gained by parties acting together is taken by the strongest.—To put or run one's head into the lion's mouth, to put one's self into a position of great danger.

Lion-ant (lī'on-ant), n. A large species of ant of the genus Myrmecoleon, family Myrmecoleonidae. Called otherwise Ant-lion. See ANT-LION.

Lionced, Leonced (lī'onst, lē'onst), pp. In her, adorned with lions' heads, as a cross the ends of which terminate in lions' heads.

Lioncelle (lī'on-sel), n. In her, a small lion, especially one of several borne in the same coat of arms.

Lion-dog (lī'on-dog), n. A variety of dog which has a flowing mane.

Lionel (lī'on-el), n. [Līon, and el, dim.] A lion's whelp; a young lion.

Lioness (lī'on-es), n. The female of the lion kind.

Lionet (lī'on-et), n. A young or small lion.

Like the young lionet,
When first he bathes his murderous jaws in blood.
Southey.

Lion-heart (lī'on-härt), n. One who has great courage.

Lion-hearted (lī'on-härt-ed), a. Having a lion's heart or courage; brave and magnanimous. 'Richard the Lion-hearted.' Sir W. Scott.

Lionism (lī'on-izm), n. The attracting of notice as a lion; the treating of a person as an object of curiosity; the pursuit of curiosities or shows. See LION, 4.

All common Lionism, which ruins many men, was nothing to this. Carlyle.

Lionize (lī'on-īz), v. t. 1. To visit, as the objects of curiosity in a place.—2. To treat as a lion or as an object of curiosity and interest.

Can he do nothing for his Burns but lionize him?
Carlyle.

3. To exhibit objects of curiosity to; to take to visit the lions.

Mr. Southey very hospitably takes an opportunity to lionize the ghost round the lakes, and directs his attention to the most beautiful points of view. Macaulay.

Lionize (lī'on-īz), v. i. To visit the lions or objects of interest or curiosity of a place.

Lion-lizard (lī'on-līz-ērd), n. A name given to the basilisk (Basiliscus americanus), from the crest (or mane) on its back and tail.

Lionly (lī'on-lī), a. Like a lion; fierce. 'The lionly form.' Milton.

Lion's-foot (lī'onz-fūt), n. A name common to all the plants of the genus Leontopodium. The name is also given to other plants of different genera.

Lionship (lī'on-shīp), n. The condition, position, or personality of a lion (in senses 1 and 4); a ludicrous title of address to a lion.

Lion's-leaf (lī'onz-lēf), n. A name for plants of the genus Leontice, especially L. leontopetalon, the tuberous roots of which contain so much alkali that they are sometimes used as a substitute for soap.

Lion's-mouth (lī'onz-mūth), n. A popular name for the snap-dragon (Antirrhinum majus).

Lion's-tooth (lī'onz-tōth), n. See LEONTODON.

Lion-tiger (lī'on-tī-gēr), n. A cross-breed between a lion and a tiger.

Lion-toothed (lī'on-tōtht), a. Having teeth like those of a lion.

Lip (līp), n. [A. Sax. līppe, O. Fris. līppa, D. lip, Dan. and G. lippe; allied to E. verb to lap; Lith. lupa, Per. lab, Hind. lūb, L. labium, lip. L. labio, to lap, is a nasalized form of the root.] 1. The edge or border of the mouth. The lips are two fleshy or muscular parts composing the exterior of the mouth in man and many other animals. In man the lips form the covering of the teeth, and are organs of speech essential to certain articulations. Hence, the lips by a figure denote the mouth, or all the organs of speech, and sometimes speech itself.—2. Anything resembling a lip; the edge or border of anything; as, the lip of a vessel; the lips of a wound.—3. In bot. (a) one of the two opposite divisions of a labiate corolla. The upper is called the helmet, and the lower the beard. (b) The third petal of an orchid, which is usually turned towards the lower front of the flower, and different in form from the others.—4. One of the two sides of the aperture of spiral shells, that which joins the columella being called the inner, and the opposite part of the circumference the outer lip.—To make a lip, to drop the under lip in sullenness or contempt.

A letter for me! it gives me an estate of seven years' health; in which time I will make a lip at the physician. Shak.

Lip (līp), v. t. 1. To touch, as with the lip; to kiss.

As when
A stone is flung into some sleeping tarn,
The circle widens till it lip the marge.
Spread the slow smile thro' all her company. Tennyson.

2. To speak; to utter. 'When I heard my name most fondly lipped.' Keats.—3. [Scotch.] To notch, as the edge of a sword or knife.

Liparocele (li-par'ô-sêl), n. [Gr. liparos, fat, and kêle, tumour.] A tumour consisting chiefly or wholly of fat.

Lip-devotion (lip'dê-vô-shon), n. Prayers uttered by the lips without the desires of the heart.

Lip-devotion will not serve the turn; it undervalues the very thing it prays for. It is indeed the begging of a denial, and shall certainly be answered in what it begs. South.

Lip-good (lip'gud), a. Good in profession only.

His grace is merely by lip-good. B. Jonson.

Lip-laborious† (lip'la-bô-ri-us), a. Uttering words without sentiments; hypocritical. The lower the times grew, the worse they were at the bottom: the Bramins grew hypocritical and lip-laborious. Lord.

Lip-labour (lip'la-bêr), n. Labour or action of the lips without concurrence of the mind or heart; words without sentiments. 'Mund babbling and lip-labour.' Bale.

Lip-language (lip'lang-gwaj), n. In the instruction of the deaf and dumb, oral or articulate language, in contradistinction to the language of signs or of the fingers.

Liplet (lip'let), n. A little lip.

Lipogram (lip'pô-gram), n. [Gr. leipo, to leave, and gramma, a letter.] A writing in which a particular letter is wholly omitted.

Lipogrammatic (lip'pô-gram-mat'ik), a. Pertaining to the writing of lipograms, a term applied to compositions in which a particular letter is omitted throughout, as in the Odyssey of Tryphiodorus, in which there was no A in the first book, no B in the second, and so on.

Lipogrammatism (lip'pô-gram-mat-izm), n. The art or practice of writing lipograms or pieces with a particular letter omitted throughout.

Lipogrammatist (lip'pô-gram-mat-ist), n. One who writes lipograms or pieces throughout which a particular letter is omitted.

Lipothymia, Lipothymy (lip'pô-thim'i-a, li-poth'i-mi), n. Same as Leipothymia.

Lipothymic, Lipothymous (li-pô-thim'ik, li-poth'i-mus), a. Leipothymic (which see).

Lipped (lipt), a. Having lips; having a raised or rounded edge resembling the lip: often used in composition.—Lipped and harled, in Scotland, an epithet applied to a wall built of stones without mortar, but which has the joints afterwards filled with mortar, and the whole wall plastered over with what is called rough-cast or harling.

Lippen (lip'en), v.t. [Allied to Goth. laub-jan, to trust; & glauiben, to believe, to trust.] To intrust; to trust; as, he lippened it to me. [Scotch.]

Lippen (lip'en), v.i. To rely upon; to trust to; to depend upon. [Old English and Scotch.]

Lippening (lip'en-ing), a. Occasional; accidental. [Scotch.]

I aye telled the gudeman ye meant weel to him; but he taks the tout at every bit lippening word. Sir W. Scott.

Lippia (lip'i-a), n. [In honour of M. Lippi, a French physician and traveller in Abyssinia.] A genus of plants, nat. order Verbenaceæ, containing numerous species of shrubs or undershrubs (rarely herbs) with small flowers in dense heads or slender spikes. They are natives of the warmer regions of both hemispheres, especially of America. L. pseudo-thea, a native of Brazil, is aromatic and fragrant, and when dried forms an agreeable tea.

Lippie, Lippy (lip'i), n. [A. Sax. leap, a basket. See LEAP.] The fourth part of a peck. [Scotch.]

Lippitude (lip'i-tüd), n. [L. lippitudo, from lippus, blear-eyed.] Soreness of eyes; bleariness.

Lip-reading (lip'rêd-ing), n. Reading or understanding what one says by the movement of the lips: used in regard to the deaf and dumb.

Lip-wisdom (lip'wiz-dom), n. Wisdom in talk without practice; wisdom in words not supported by experience.

I find that all is but lip-wisdom, which wants experience. Sir P. Sidney.

Lip-work† (lip'wêrk), n. 1. Lip-labour. Milton.—2. The act of kissing. B. Jonson.

Lip-working† (lip'wêrk-ing), p. and a. Professing with the lips without corresponding practice; lip-laborious. Milton.

Liqueable (lik'wâ-bl), a. Capable of being liquefied or melted.

Liquate (lik'wât), v.i. [L. liquo, liquatum, to make liquid, to melt. See LIQUID.] To melt; to liquefy; to be dissolved.

Liquate (lik'wât), v.t. pret. & pp. liquated; ppr. liquating. To melt; to liquefy; specifically, in metal, to separate, as one metal from another less fusible, by applying just sufficient heat to melt the more easily liquefiable, so that it can be run off from the other.

Liquation (li-kwâ'shon), n. [L. liquatio, liquationis, from liquo. See LIQUATE.] 1. The act or operation of liquating or melting.—2. The condition or capacity of being melted; as, a substance congealed beyond liquation.—3. The process of separating by a regulated heat an easily fusible metal from an alloy in which is a metal difficult of fusion.

Liquefacient (lik-wê-fâ'shi-ent), n. That which liquefies or serves to liquefy; in med. an agent which augments the secretions and promotes the liquefying processes of the animal economy.

Liquefaction (lik-wê-fâk'shon), n. [L. liquefactio, from liquefacio, to make liquid, to melt—liquo, to be fluid, and facio, to make.] 1. The act or operation of melting or dissolving; the conversion of a solid into a liquid by the sole agency of heat or caloric: sometimes specially applied to the melting of substances which pass through intermediate states of softness before they become fluid, as tallow, wax, resin, &c.—2. The state of being melted.

Liquefiable (lik-wê-fi-a-bl), a. Capable of being liquefied, melted, or changed from a solid to a liquid state.

Liquefier (lik-wê-fi-êr), n. One who or that which liquefies or melts.

Liquefy (lik-wê-fi), v.t. pret. & pp. liquefied; ppr. liquefying. [Fr. liquefier, from L. liquefacio. See LIQUOR.] To convert from a fixed or solid form to that of a liquid, and technically to melt by the sole agency of heat; to melt; to dissolve.

Liquefy (lik-wê-fi), v.i. To be melted; to become liquid.

The blood of St. Januarius liquefied at the approach of the saint's head. Addison.

Liquescency (li-kwes'sen-si), n. The condition of being liquescent; aptness to melt.

Liquescent (li-kwes'sent), a. [L. liquescentis, liquescentis, ppr. of liquesco, to become fluid, inchoative from liquo, to be liquid.] Melting; becoming fluid.

Liqueur (li-kûr), n. [Fr.] A spirituous compound of water, alcohol, sugar, and some infusion or extract from fruits, spices, and various aromatic substances.

Liqueurs may be distinguished as of three qualities: first, the ratafias, or simple liqueurs, in which the sugar, the alcohol, and the aromatic substances are in small quantities; such are anise-water, noyau, the apricot, cherry, &c., ratafias. The second are the oils or fine liqueurs, with more saccharine and spirituous matter, as the anisette, curaçoa, &c. The third are the creams or superfine liqueurs, as rosoglio, maraschino, Danzig water, &c. Pop. Ency.

Lithia (lith'i-a), n. [From Gr. lithos, a stone, in allusion to the existence of the earth in a stony mineral.] [L. O.] 1. The only known oxide of the metal lithium, which was at first found in a mineral called petalite. It is of a white colour, very soluble in water, acid, caustic, and acts on colours like other alkalies.—2. In med. the formation of stone, gravel, or concretions in the human body. Also an affection in which the eyelids are edged with small, hard, stone-like concretions.

Lithiasis (li-thí-a-sis), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone.] In med. the formation of a calculus or stone in any part of the body, especially the urinary passages.

Lithate (lith'át), n. Same as Lithate.

Lithic (lith'ik), a. 1. Pertaining to or consisting of stone.

When we first meet the Buddhist style (of architecture) it is in its infancy—a wooden style painfully struggling into lithic forms. James Ferguson.

2. Pertaining to stone in the bladder; uric.—Lithic acid, an acid obtained from urinary or gouty calculi. See under URIC.

Lithium (lith'i-um), n. Sym. Li. At. wt. 7. The metallic base of lithia, which base was obtained by Sir H. Davy in the electrolysis of fused lithium chloride; it is of a silver-white lustre, but quickly tarnishes in the air. Lithium may be cut with a knife, but it is scarcely so soft as potassium or sodium; it fuses at 180° C., and takes fire at a somewhat higher temperature. Lithium floats upon rock-oil; it is the lightest of all known solid bodies; sp. gr. 0.5386. It forms salts analogous to those of potassium and sodium.

Lithobiblion† (lith-o-bib'li-on), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and biblion, a book.] Bibliolite (which see).

Lithocarp (lith-o-käp), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and karpōs, fruit.] Fossil fruit; carpollite (which see).

Lithochromatics, Lithochromics (lith-o-kro-mat'iks, lith-o-kro'miks), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and chrōma, colour.] The art of painting in oil upon stone, and of taking impressions on canvas.

Lithocyst (lith-o-sist), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and kystis, a cyst.] In zool. one of the sense-organs or marginal bodies of the Lucernaria or steganophthalmate Medusæ.

No certain evidence of the existence of a nervous system in the Hydrozoa has yet been obtained, but there can be little doubt that the lithocysts, or sacs containing mineral particles, which are so frequently found in the Medusoids and Medusæ, are of the nature of auditory organs; while the masses of pigment, with embedded refracting bodies, which occur often associated with the lithocysts, are doubtless rudimentary eyes. Huxley.

Lithodendron (lith-o-den'dron), n. [Gr. lithos, stone, and dendron, tree.] A genus of carboniferous corals, so called from their resemblance to a petrified branch.

Lithodome (lith-o-dōm), n. One of several species of molluscous animals, which make holes in rocks, shells, &c., in which they lodge; one of the genus Lithodomus.

Lithodomous (li-tho-dō-mus), a. Relating to a genus of molluscs which perforate stones, &c.

Lithodomi (li-tho-dō-mi), n. pl. Lithodomi (li-tho-dō-mi). [Gr. lithos, stone, and domos, house.] A genus of Lamellibranchiata, belonging to the mussel family, which perforate stones, shells, &c. The mede in which the perforations are made is a subject of dispute.

Lithogenesy† (lith-o-jen'e-si), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and genesis, generation.] The doctrine or science of the origin of minerals composing the globe, and of the causes which have produced their form and disposition.

Lithogenous (li-tho'en-us), a. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and gennao, to produce.] Stone-producing; pertaining to the class of animals which form coral.

Lithoglyph (lith'o-glif), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and glyphō, to engrave or sculpture.] The art of engraving on precious stones, &c.

Lithoglypher† (li-thog'lif-ér), n. One who cuts or engraves precious stones.

Lithoglyphic (lith-o-glif'ik), a. Relating to the art of cutting or engraving precious stones.

Lithoglyphite (li-thog'li-fit), n. [See LITHOGLYPH.] A fossil that presents the appearance of being engraved or shaped by art.

Lithoglyptics (li-tho-glip'tiks), n. The art of cutting or engraving precious stones; lithoglyph.

Lithograph (li-tho'-graf), v.t. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and graphō, to write.] To engrave or trace on stone, and transfer to paper, &c., by printing.

Lithograph (li-tho'-graf), n. A print from a drawing on stone.

Lithographer (li-thog'raf-ēr), n. One who practises lithography.

Lithographic, Lithographical (li-tho-graf'ik, li-tho-graf'ik-al), a. Pertaining to lithography; engraved upon or printed from stone; as, lithographic engravings, lithographic press. — Lithographic stone, lithographic slate, a slaty compact limestone, of a yellowish colour and fine grain, used in lithography. The best comes from the flaggy oolites of Solenhofen in Bavaria; but others are got in the oolites of England, France, Greece, and from older rocks in Canada.

Lithographically (li-tho-graf'ik-al-li), adv. By the lithographic art.

Lithography (li-thog'ra-fi), n. [See LITHOGRAPH.] The art of writing or drawing on stone, and of producing impressions from it on paper: an art invented by A. Sennefelder at Munich, in 1793. The principles upon which this art is founded are—(1) The quality which a compact granular limestone has of imbibing grease or moisture; and (2) the antipathy of grease and water for each other. A drawing being made upon a dry prepared stone with an ink or crayon of a greasy composition, is washed over with water, which sinks into all the parts of the stone not defended by the drawing. A roller, charged with printing ink, is then passed all over the stone, and the drawing receives the greasy ink, whilst the wetted surface protects the other parts of the stone from it. Impressions of the drawing may then be taken upon paper, by means of a press. For writings, the most common method is to write with a prepared ink on paper, and then transfer the writing to the stone by passing it through the press, after which the stone is wetted, and the writing can be printed from as already described.

Lithoid, Lithoidal (li-tho'id, li-tho'id'al), a. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and eidos, resemblance.] Resembling a stone; of a stony structure.

Litholabe (li-tho-lāb), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and labein, to seize.] In surg. an instrument employed for laying hold of a stone in the bladder, and keeping it fixed, so that lithotritic instruments can act upon it.

Litholary (li-tho-la'-tri), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and latreia, service, worship.] The worship of stones of particular shapes.

Lithologic, Lithological (li-tho-loj'ik, li-tho-loj'ik-al), a. Of or pertaining to lithology or the science of stones; pertaining to the character of a rock, as derived from the nature and mode of aggregation of its mineral contents.

Lithologically (li-tho-loj'ik-al-li), adv. In a lithological manner; from a lithological point of view; as, to regard a stratum lithologically.

Lithologist (li-tho-lo-jist), n. A person skilled in the science of stones.

Lithology (li-tho-lo-ji), n. [Gr. lithos, stone, and logos, discourse.] 1. The science or natural history of stones; the study of the mineral structure of rocks.—2. In med. a treatise on stones found in the body.

Lithomancy (li-tho-man-si), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and manteia, divination.] Divination or prediction of events by means of stones.

Lithomarge (li-tho-mārij), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and L. marga, marl.] A term applied to several varieties of clay, distinguished by great fineness and capability of being fused into a soft slag. They are friable and indurated, and more siliceous than aluminous.

Lithontriptic, Lithontriptic (li-th-on-thrip'tik, li-th-on-thrip'tik), a. [Gr. lithos, stone, and thruptō, to wear or break, trōbō, to rub, to grind.] Same as Lithotritic.

Lithontriptic, Lithontriptic (li-th-on-thrip'tik, li-th-on-thrip'tik), n. A medicine which has the power of destroying the stone in the bladder or kidneys; a solvent of stone in the human urinary passages.

Lithotriptist (li-th-on-thrip-tist), n. Same as Lithotritist.

Lithontriptor (li-th'on-thrip-tēr), n. Same as Lithotritor.

Lithophagi, Lithophagidae (li-tho-fa-ji, li-tho-fa-ji-dē), n. pl. [See LITHOPHAGOUS.] A name applied to all bivalve and univalve mollusca, radiata, &c., that penetrate stones, masses of madrepora, and other hard corals, forming a nidus or shallow basin-like lodgment for themselves.

Lithophagous (li-tho-fa-gus), a. [Gr. lithos, stone, and phagō, to eat.] Eating or swallowing stones or gravel, as the ostrich; also, perforating stones.

Lithophane (li-tho-fān), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and phanos, clear, transparent.] A peculiar style of ornamentation adapted for lamps, decorative windows, and other transparencies, produced by impressing thin sheets of porcelain, when in a soft state, into figures, which become visible when viewed by transmitted light.

Lithosphor (li-tho'-fos-for), n. [Gr. lithos, stone, and phosphoros.] A stone that becomes phosphorescent by heat.

Lithosphoric (li-tho'-fos-for'ik), a. Pertaining to lithosphor; becoming phosphoric by heat.

Lithophotography (li-tho'-fō-tog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and E. photography.] The art of producing prints from lithographic stones by means of photographic pictures developed on their surface.

Lithophyl (li-tho'-fi), n. [Gr. lithos, stone, and phylon, a leaf.] A fossil leaf or impression of a leaf, or a stone containing such.

Lithophyte (li-tho'-fit), n. [Gr. lithos, stone, and phyton, a plant; lit. stone-plant.] A name given to those species of polypes whose substance is stony or horny, as the corals and sea-fans. The older naturalists classed them with plants, hence the name.

Lithophytic (li-tho'-ft'ik), a. Pertaining to lithophytes.

Lithophytous (li-tho-ft'it-us), a. Pertaining to or consisting of lithophytes.

Lithornis (li-thor'nis), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and ornis, a bird.] The generic name proposed by Professor Owen for certain bird-remains from the eocene clay at Sheppey. The bird is supposed to have been accipitrine, whence the species found has been called L. vulturinus.

Lithosiæ (li-tho-si'-dē), n. pl. [Type-genus Lithosia, Gr. lithos, a stone, and eidos, resemblance.] A small family of Lepidoptera, section Heterocera, characterized by a slender body, slender and setaceous antennæ, long and spiral maxillæ, moderate-sized, three-jointed labial palpi, and long and delicate wings. Some of the family are of brilliant colours, but the British species of the genus Lithosia are of a sombre colour.

Lithospermum (li-tho-spér'mum), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and sperma, seed—the little nuts or seeds being extremely hard, and having a surface as smooth as a polished pebble.] A genus of annual, biennial, and perennial herbs, mostly natives of Europe, nat. order Boraginaceæ. L. tinctorium contains a reddish-brown substance used by dyers. Three species are natives of Britain, and are popularly known as gromwell (which see).

Lithostrotion (li-tho-strō'ti-on), n. [Gr. lithostrotos, inlaid with stones—lithos, a stone, and strōtos, spread.] The name given by Lloyd to certain fossil corals found chiefly in the mountain limestone.

Lithotint (li-tho'-tint), n. 1. The art or process of producing pictures in colours from a lithographic stone.—2. The picture so produced.

Lithotome (li-tho'-tōm), n. [Gr. lithos, stone, and temnō, to cut.] 1. A stone so formed naturally as to appear as if cut artificially. 2. In surg. an instrument for cutting the bladder in operations for the stone.

Lithotomic, Lithotomical (li-tho-tōm'ik, li-tho-tōm'ik-al), a. Pertaining to or performed by lithotomy.

Lithotomist (li-tho-tōm'-mist), n. [See LITHOTOMY.] One who performs the operation of cutting for the stone in the bladder, or one who is skilled in the operation.

Lithotomy (li-tho-tō-mi), n. [Gr. lithos, stone, and temnō, to cut.] The operation, art, or practice of cutting for the stone in the bladder.

Lithotripsy (li-tho-trip-si), n. Same as Lithotripsy.

Lithotriptist (li-tho-trip-tist), n. Same as Lithotritist.

Lithotriptor (li-th'o-trip-tēr), n. Same as Lithotritor.

Lithotrite (li-th'o-trit), n. Same as Lithotritor.

Lithotritic (li-tho-trit'ik), a. Of or pertaining to lithotripsy; having the quality of destroying stone in the bladder.

Lithotritist (li-th'o-trit-ist), n. One skilled in breaking and extracting stone in the bladder.

Lithotritor (li-th'o-trit-ēr), n. An instrument for triturating the stone in the bladder, so as to reduce it to small particles which may admit of being passed along with the urine, and thus render the operation of lithotomy unnecessary.

Lithotripsy (li-tho'tri-ti), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and L. tro, tritum, to rub, to grind.] The operation of triturating the stone in the bladder by means of an instrument called a lithotriptor.

Lithotype (li-tho'-tip), n. A kind of stereotype plate produced by lithotypy.

Lithotype (li-tho'-tip), v.t. To prepare for printing by lithotypy.

Lithotypy (li-tho'ti-pi), n. [Gr. lithos, a stone, and typos, impression.] A peculiar process of stereotyping by pressing the types of a page set up into a soft mould or matrix. On the removal of the types the hollows left by them are filled with a mixture of gum shellac, fine sand, tar, and linseed-oil in a heated state. This mixture when thrown into cold water becomes as hard as a stone, and forms a plate ready to be printed from. From the sand present in it it has a stony texture, whence the name.

Lithoxyle, Lithoxyle (li-thoks'yl, li-thoks'yl-it), n. [Gr. lithos, stone, and xylon, wood.] A variety of opal, in which the form and texture of the wood which has been petrified into the mineral is still distinctly visible.

Lithuanian (li-th-ū-ā-ni-an), a. Of or pertaining to Lithuania in Poland, or to its people or language.

Lithuanian (li-th-ū-ā-ni-an), n. 1. A native or inhabitant of Lithuania.—2. The language of Lithuania. It is a member of the Slavonic family of Aryan tongues, and is gradually becoming extinct before the encroachments of Russian and German.

Lithy (lith'ī), a. [See LITHE.] Easily bent; pliable; lithic.

Lithy (lith'ī), a. [See LITHER.] Lazy; depraved; wicked.

Litigable (li-ti-ga-bl), a. Capable of being litigated or defended at law.

Litigant (li-ti-gant), a. Disposed to litigate; contending in law; engaged in a lawsuit.

Litigant (li-ti-gant), n. A person engaged in a lawsuit.

Litigate (li-ti-gāt), v.t. pret. & pp. litigated; ppr. litigating. [L. litigo, litigatum—lis, litis, strife, dispute, quarrel, and ago, to carry on.] To make the subject of a lawsuit; to bring before a court of law for decision; to prosecute or defend by pleadings, exhibition of evidence, and judicial debate.

Dar'st thou still litigate thy cause,
Spite of these numerous awful witnesses? Young.

Litigate (li-ti-gāt), v.i. To carry on a suit by judicial process.

The appellant, after the interposition of an appeal, still litigates in the same cause. Ayliffe.

Litigation (li-ti-gā'shon), n. The act or process of litigating or carrying on a suit in a court of law or equity for the recovery of a right or claim; a judicial contest.

Nothing quells a spirit of litigation like despair of success. Paley.

Litigator (li-ti-gāt-ēr), n. One who litigates.

Litigosity (li-ti-jī'-os'i-ti), n. 1. The character or quality of being litigious.—2. In Scots law, a tacit legal prohibition of alienation, to the prejudice of a begun action or diligence, the object of which is to attain the possession or to acquire the property of a particular subject, or to attach it in security of debt.

Litigious (li-tij'us), a. [Fr. litigieux, L. litigiosus, quarrelsome, contentious, from litigium, a dispute. See LITIGATE.] 1. Inclined to go to law; given to the practice of bringing lawsuits; quarrelsome; contentious; fond of litigation. 'A pettifogging attorney or a litigious client.' Macaulay.—2. Disputable; controvertible; subject to contention; as, litigious right.

No fences, parted fields, nor marks nor bounds, Distinguish'd acres of litigious grounds. Dryden.

3. In law, an epithet applied to a church where several persons lay claim to the patronage, and present several clerks to the ordinary, which fact excuses him from admitting any until the right of presentation is decided.

If two presentations be offered to the bishop upon the same avoidance, the church is then said to become litigious; and, if nothing further be done, the bishop may suspend the admission of either, and suffer a lapse to incur. Blackstone.

Litigiously (li-tij'us-li), adv. In a litigious or contentious manner.

Litigiousness (li-tij'us-nes), n. The condition or quality of being litigious; a disposition to engage in or carry on lawsuits; inclination to judicial contests.

Litistestamentation (li-tis-kon-tes-tā'shon), n. [From L. lis, litis, and E. contestation.] In Scots law, the appearance of parties in court to contest their rights.

Litispence (li-tis-pen'dens), n. [L. lis, litis, a lawsuit, and E. pence.] The time during which a lawsuit is going on.

Litling, † a. Very little. Chaucer.

Litmus (lit'mus), n. [G. lackmus, D. lakmoes—lack, lacker, and mus, mucus, a semi-liquid preparation, pap.] A peculiar colouring matter procured from Rocella tinctoria and some other lichens. Paper tinged blue by litmus is reddened by the feeblest acids, and hence is used as a test for the presence of acids; and litmus paper which has been reddened by an acid has its blue colour restored by an alkali.

Litorn (lit'orn), n. [Fr. litorne. Origin unknown.] A European bird, a species of thrush.

Litotes (li'tō-tēz), n. [Gr. litotēs, plainness, simplicity.] In rhet. a figure, according to the Greek and Latin rhetoricians, in which an affirmative is expressed by the negative of the contrary. It expresses less than what is intended to be conveyed to the mind of the reader or hearer. Thus, 'a citizen of no mean city,' means, 'of an illustrious city.' It is a figure constantly employed to soften what might otherwise appear obnoxious in self-commendation.

Litrameter (li-tram'et-ēr), n. [Gr. litra, a weight, and metron, a measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the specific gravity of liquids.

Litre (lē'tr), n. [Fr., from L.L. litra, from Gr. litra, a pound.] The French standard measure of capacity in the decimal system. The litre is a cubic decimetre; that is, a cube, each of the sides of which is 3.937 English inches; it contains 61.028 English cubic inches; the English imperial gallon is equal to fully 4.54345797 litres, or more exactly 4.54345797 litres.

Litter (lit'tēr), n. [Fr. litière, Pr. littiera, from L.L. lectaria, and that from L. lectus, a bed or couch, from lego, lectum, to gather, to lay.] 1. A vehicle formed with shafts supporting a bed between them, in which a person may be borne by men or by a horse. If by the latter it is called a horse-litter.—2. Straw, hay, or other soft substance, used as a bed for horses and other animals; also, a covering of straw for plants.—3. Waste matters, shreds, fragments, and the like, scattered on a floor or other place; scattered rubbish; things scattered about or over in careless or slovenly manner.

Strephon, who found the room was void,
Stole in, and took a strict survey
Of all the litter as it lay. Swift.

4. A condition of disorder or confusion; as, the room is in a litter.

Litter (lit'tēr), v.t. 1. To scatter straw, hay, or other similar substance on or over for bedding.

He found a stall where oxen stood,
But for his ease well littered was the floor. Dryden.

2. To spread a bed for; to supply with litter; as, to litter a horse.—3. To make litter of; to use for litter. 'Old leaves and littered straw.' Doddsey.—4. To scatter things over or about in a careless or slovenly manner.

They found
The room with volumes littered round. Swift.

Litter (lit'tēr), v.i. To be supplied with litter for bedding; to sleep in litter; as, he littered in the straw.

Litter (lit'tēr), n. [Comp. Icel. látr, the place where animals lay their young, from lag, a layer, a laying.] 1. The young produced at a birth by a quadruped, especially by a quadruped which brings forth a number at a birth, as the sow, the rabbit, the cat, the bitch, &c.—2. A birth or bringing forth, as of pigs, kittens, rabbits, puppies, &c. 'The thirty pigs at one large litter farrowed.' Dryden.

Litter (lit'tēr), v.t. To bring forth; to give birth to: said of quadrupeds, especially of such as produce a number at a birth, as the sow, cat, rabbit, bitch, &c., or of human beings in contempt.

My father named me Autolycus; who being, as I am, littered under Mercury, was likewise a snapper-up of unconsidered trifles. Shak.

Litter (lit'tēr), v.t. To bring forth a litter or young.

A horrible desert, . . . where the she-wolf still littered. Macaulay.

Litterateur (lit'tér-a-tér), n. [Fr. littérateur.] A literary man; one engaged in literary work; one who adopts literature as a profession.

Beffriended by one and another kind-hearted litterateur after another. C. Kingsley.

Littery (lit'tér-i), a. Consisting of litter; encumbered or covered with litter.

Little (lit'l), a. [The regular comparative and superlative of the word are wanting, and are supplied from a different root. The comparative used is less, or more rarely lesser. For the superlative least is used, the regular form littlest occurring very rarely except as a provincialism, and occasionally in colloquial language. It is used, however, by Shakspeare. See LITTEST.] [A. Sax. lytel, O.E. litell, bytylle, &c., also lyte, lite, lile, lille, D. luttel, Icel. litill, Sw. liten, Dan. liden, litte, Goth. leitils, litte; O.H.G. luzzi; farther alliances doubtful.] 1. Small in size or extent; not great or large; as, a little body; a little animal; a little piece of ground; a little table; a little book; a little hill; a little distance; a little child.—2. Short in duration; as, a little time or season; a little sleep.—3. Small in quantity or amount; as, a little hay or grass; a little food; a little sum; a little light; a little air or water.—4. Of small dignity, power, or importance.

When thou wast little in thine own sight, wast thou not made the head of the tribes of Israel? 1 Sam. xv. 17.

5. Of small force or effect; slight; inconsiderable; as, little attention or exertions; little effort; little care or diligence; little weight. 6. Small in generosity; not liberal; mean; narrow; insignificant; paltry; selfish.

The talent of turning men into ridicule, and exposing to laughter those one converses with, is the qualification of little, ungenerous tempers. Addison.

However we brave it out we men are a little breed. Tennyson.

7. In the fine arts, a term denoting that a work is devoid of those qualities that tend to raise the mind of the spectator.—SYN. Diminutive, brief, insignificant, contemptible, weak, slight, inconsiderable.

Little (lit'l), n. 1. That which is little; a small quantity, amount, space, and the like.

A little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked. Ps. xxxvii. 16.

I view with anger and disdain,
How little gives thee joy or pain. Prior.

2. Small degree or scale; miniature. 'His picture in little.' Shak.—A little, somewhat; to or in a small degree; to a limited extent; for a short time. 'The painter flattered her a little.' Shak. 'Sub-acid substances are proper, though they are a little astringent.' Arbuthnot. 'Stay a little.' Shak.—By little and little, by slow degrees; gradually.

Little (lit'l), adv. In a small quantity or degree; not much; slightly; as, he is little changed. 'The poor sleep little.' Otway.

Little-ease (lit'l-ēz), n. An old name for any kind of peculiarly uneasy punishment, as the stocks, pillory, or some especially uncomfortable part of a prison.

Was not this fellow's preaching a cause of all the trouble in Israel? was he not worthy to be cast in board or little-ease? Bp. Latimer.

Little-go (lit'l-gō), n. In the English universities, a cant term for a public examination about the middle of the course, which, being less strict and less important in its consequences than the final one, has received this appellation.

Little-gude (lit'l-güd), n. The devil. [Scotch.]

The Little-gude was surely busy that night, for I thought the apparition was the widow. Gall.

Littleness (lit'l-nes), n. The state or quality of being little; smallness of size or bulk; meanness; want of grandeur or dignity; as, the littleness of the body or of an animal; littleness of conception.

The English and French, in verse, are forced to raise their language with metaphors, by the pompousness of the whole phrase to wear off any littleness that appears in the particular parts. Addison.

The angelic grandeur, by being concealed, does not awaken our poverty, nor mortify our littleness so much as if it was always displayed. Fer. Collier.

Littlest (lit'l-est), a. The regular but seldom used superlative of little.

Where love is great, the littlest doubts are fear. Shak.

Littleworth (lit'l-wérth), a. Worthless: a term often applied to a person who has a bad character, and is viewed as destitute of moral principle.

He returned for answer that he would not come to a stranger. He defended himself by saying, 'He had once come to a stranger who sent for him; and he found him a littleworth person.' Boswell.

Littleworth (lit'l-wérth), n. A person of little personal character, or of actually bad character; a blackguard.

Littoral (lit'tō-rāl), a. [L. littoralis, from littus, shore.] Of or pertaining to a shore, as of the sea or a great lake; inhabiting the sea-shore.—Littoral zone, the interval or zone on a sea-coast between high and low water mark.

Littorella (lit-tō-rel'la), n. [From L. littus, littoris, the shore, in allusion to its place of growth.] A genus of plants, nat. order Plantaginaceae, containing one species, L. lacustris. It is an insignificant plant with grass-like leaves and small white monococious flowers, the females sessile, the males on long stalks, with conspicuous anthers. It grows on the margins of lakes and ponds throughout the continent of Europe, as well as in Britain, where it is known under the name of shoreweed.

Littorina (lit-tō-rī'na), n. [L. littus, littoris, the sea-shore.] A genus of pectinibranchiate molluscs, found on the sea-shores in all parts of the world, and which feed on seaweed. They inhabit a thick turbinated shell, of which the aperture presents a small angle, and is without a ridge. The common periwinkle is a specimen of this genus.

Littorinidæ (lit-tor-in'i-dē), n. pl. A family of gasteropodous molluscs, of which the genus Littorina is the type. See LITTORINA.

Lituate (lit'ū-āt), a. [L. lituus, a staff used by the augurs in taking omens, also a trumpet slightly bent at the end.] In bot. forked, with the points a little turned outwards.

Lituiform (lit'ū-i-form), a. [L. lituus (see LITUATE), and forma, shape.] Curved like a lituus.

Liver (liv'ér), n. [A. Sax. lifer, D. and Dan. lever, Icel. lifr, G. leber; probably allied to G. lab, rennet, E. lapper, Sc. lapper, to coagulate, from its resemblance to a mass of clotted blood.] The glandular structure which in animals secretes the bile. In man it forms the largest gland of the body, weighing from 50 to 60 oz. The liver is not confined to vertebrates, all of which, with the exception of the Amphioxus or lancelet, possess a well-developed liver, but is found in many invertebrates. In the vertebrates the liver is a bilateral organ, and in early life it exhibits a perfect two-sided symmetry, extending to either side of the body; but as development advances the left lobe decreases in size, leaving the right lobe to form the larger half of the organ. The under surface of the liver shows a further subdivision of its parts into five lobes, separated by four fissures or clefts. The longitudinal fissure forms a deep groove dividing the liver into right and left lobes. The fissure for the gall-bladder forms a second cleft on the under surface of the organ. The third is the fissure of the inferior vena cava, lying in the same line as the fissure of the gall-bladder. The fourth is known as the transverse or portal fissure, which in a manner unites the other fissures and runs at right angles into the longitudinal fissure. The transverse fissure transmits three vessels—the hepatic artery, the portal vein, and the hepatic duct—all of importance in the structure and functions of the liver. The two former vessels enter the organ and supply it with blood; the latter duct leaves the liver by the fissure, and carries the biliary secretion from the gland. In man the liver occupies a position in the right upper side and towards the front of the abdominal cavity. The liver is of a reddish-brown colour.—Liver of antimony, an oxy-sulphuretted of antimony.—Liver of sulphur, fused sulphuretted of potassium: so called from its liver-colour.

Lizard (liz'èrd), n. [Fr. lézard, from L. lacerta, lacertus, a lizard.] 1. The popular English name of all the lacertilian reptiles, but specifically restricted to the members of the family Lacertidae. The true lizards have four legs, with five toes each, a scaly exoskeleton, a slender bifid protrusible tongue, and a heart with two auricles and one ventricle. The only true British lizards are the sand-lizard and the viviparous lizard. The graceful little green lizard of the Continent is the Lacerta viridis. It occurs also in Jersey. The Megalosaur and other large fossil saurians are lizard-like, though in several points they resemble the crocodile. The monitors, iguanas, geckos, and chameleons are also commonly included under this term. See SAURIA, LACERTIDÆ.—2. Naut. a piece of rope, sometimes with two legs, and one or more iron thimbles or blocks spliced into it: used in a vessel for various purposes.

Lizard-seeker (liz'èrd-sèk-ér), n. One of a genus of exotic cuckoos (Saurathera), so called because the birds live much on lizards, which they seek on the ground.

It is so named from the town of Llandello-Fawr, in Caermarthen, near which it occurs. It is 5000 feet thick in North Wales.

Llandovery Rocks (lan-dö'ver-i roks), n. pl. [From Llandovery, where these rocks are best developed.] In geol. certain beds of sandstones and shales in Wales, the upper series of which belongs to the upper Silurian, being unconformable on the lower, which goes with the lower Silurian. Both series are sandy.

Llanero (lyan-er'ö), n. [Sp., from llano.] An inhabitant of the llanos of South America. The llaneros are principally converted Indians or descendants of Indians and whites, and are distinguished for activity, ferocity, ignorance, and semi-barbarous habits. They are almost all shepherds or cattle herds.

Llanos (lan'öz or lyä'nöz), n. pl. [Sp., from L. planus, level.] Vast and almost entirely level steppes or plains in the northern part of South America. Many portions of them are covered with little or no vegetation, except on the banks of rivers and during the seasons of inundation; others again, as the plains of Venezuela, furnish pasture for large herds of cattle; while others are covered with forests.

Lloyd's (loidz), n. [Because the headquarters of the underwriters were originally Lloyd's coffee-house from 1716.] 1. A society of underwriters and others in London for the collection and diffusion of marine intelligence, the insurance, classification, and certification of vessels, and the transaction of business of various kinds connected with shipping. They have agents in various quarters of the world.—2. Rooms in the Royal Exchange, London, for the use of underwriters, &c.—Lloyd's List, a London daily publication, containing full and early information as to shipping matters.—Lloyd's Register, a register of British and foreign shipping, published yearly. The names of the vessels are alphabetically arranged, and ranked in different classes (as A1, &c.) according to their qualifications, their title to be in any class being determined by the report of surveyors, and by certain rules as to their construction, the nature of the materials, their state of repairs, age, &c.

Lloyd's Bond (loidz' bond), n. [After John Horatio Lloyd, a barrister, who first introduced them.] A species of security devised for the purpose of enabling corporate bodies, as railway companies, whose powers of borrowing money are regulated and limited by statute, to incur greater money liabilities than statutory enactment permits them to do by Lo (lō), exclam. [A. Sax. lō.] Look; see; behold; observe: used to excite the particular attention of a person to some object of sight or subject of discourse.

Lo, we turn to the Gentiles. Acts xiii. 46.

Loach, Loche (lōch), n. [Fr. loche, a loach.] 1. A small fish of the genus Cobitis (C. barbatula), inhabiting small clear streams in England, and esteemed dainty food. A smaller species, the spined loach or groundling (C. tenia), also occurs in England.—2. A name given also to the eel-pout (Lota vulgaris) and the three-bearded rockling (Motella vulgaris).

Load (lōd), n. [O. E. lode, a load, from A. Sax. hladan, to load. See LADE.] 1. A burden; that which is laid on or put in anything for conveyance; that which is borne or sustained; a weight; as, a heavy load.—2. The amount or quantity which a person can carry; the contents of a ship, wagon, cart, barrow, or the like, or in general as much as can be carried at one time by the conveyance commonly used for the article carried; as, a load of wood or coal; a load of hay.—3. That which is borne with pain or difficulty; a grievous weight; encumbrance; fig that which burdens, oppresses, or grieves the mind or spirits.

Jove lightened of its load Pope.
'Tis all men's office to speak patience To those that wring under the load of sorrow. Shak.

4. The charge of a firearm; as, a load of powder.—5. Weight or violence, as of blows. And Mnestheus laid hard load upon his helm. Dryden.

6. A quantity of food or drink that oppresses, or as much as can be borne.

There are those that can never sleep without their load, nor enjoy one easy thought till they have laid all their cares to rest with a bottle. L'Estrange.

7. In mining, the quantity of nine dishes of ore, each dish being about $\frac{1}{2}$ cwt.—8. In mech. the quantity of work done by an engine or other prime mover when loaded or working to its full power.—SYN. Weight, burden, encumbrance, freight, cargo, lading.

Load (lōd), v. t. pret. & pp. loaded; ppr. loading. [Loaden, a former pp., is hardly any longer in use; laden, which is sometimes regarded as a pp. of this verb, strictly belongs to lade.] 1. To lay a burden on; to charge with a load; to make heavy; to furnish with a lading or cargo; as, to load a camel or a horse; to load a cart or wagon.

Your carriages were heavy loaden; they are a burden to the weary beast. Is. xlv. 1.

2. To weigh down, either with what is cumbersome or embarrassing, or with what is valuable; to oppress; to encumber; to bestow or confer in great abundance; as, to load the stomach with meat; to load the mind or memory.

Those honours deep and broad, wherewith Your majesty loads our house. Shak.

3. To make heavy by something added or appended; as, to load a whip; to load a cane.—4. To place a charge in; to charge, as a gun with powder, or with powder and ball or shot.—To load die, to make one side heavier than the other, so as to cause the die to fall on that side and the side opposite to come up.—To load wine, to drug or hocus wine. 'A loaded bottle of wine.' Thackeray.

Load (lōd), n. Same as Lode.

Loader (lōd'ēr), n. One who loads.

Loading (lōd'ing), n. A cargo; a burden; also, anything that makes part of a load.

Load-line (lōd'lin), n. Naut. a line drawn on the side of a vessel to show the depth to which she sinks in the water when not over-loaded.

Loadmanage† (lōd'man-āj), n. [See LOADSMAN.] Pilotage; skill of a pilot.

Loadsmān† (lōd'mān), n. [A. Sax. lādman, a leader—lād, course, voyage, and man. See LOADSTONE.] A pilot.

Loadstar, Lodestar (lōd'stār), n. [Lode, load, A. Sax. lād, course, way, and star; the same compound appears in Icel. leiðarstjarna. See also LOADSTONE.] A star that leads or serves to guide; especially the pole-star.

Loadstone, Lodestone (lōd'stōn), n. [Better written lodestone, as it is from lode, A. Sax. lād, way, course, journey, from root of verb lead, and stone; in Icel. leiðar-steinn. Loadstar, loadsmān (or lodeman), are similar compounds.] (Fe₃O₄.) An ore of iron, consisting of the protoxide and peroxide of iron in a state of combination, and frequently called the magnetic oxide of iron. Loadstone is found in considerable masses in iron mines in Germany, Sweden, Norway, Spain, Italy, China, and several other countries. It is of a dark-gray colour, with a metallic lustre; its primitive form is the regular octahedron; sp. gr. 4.25. It was known to the ancients, and they were acquainted with the singular property which it has of attracting iron. The loadstone has the power of communicating its properties to iron and steel, which then become what are called artificial magnets. See MAGNET.

Loaf (lōf), n. pl. Loaves (lōvz). [A. Sax. hlaf, lāf; Goth. hlaihs, hlaifs, Icel. hleifr, O. H. G. hlāb, G. laib, leib, allied to Rus. chleb, Pol. chleb, bread, loaf. This word forms the lo, la of lord and lady (which see).] A thick lump or mass; especially, a large regularly shaped or moulded mass, as of bread, sugar, cake, or the like.

Loaf (lōf), v. t. To lounge; to idle away one's time. See LOAFER.

Loaf (lōf), v. t. To pass or spend in idleness, as time; to spend lazily; as, to loaf away whole days.

Loafer (lōf'ēr), n. An idle man or lounge; one who seeks his living by sponging or dubious expedients; one who is too lazy to practise a calling.

The word loafer owes something to this Gipsy root (loveo or loveoy and loveoy, to steal), as well as to the German lauffer (landläufer), and Mexican-Spanish galeofar, and for this reason, that when the term began to be popular in 1834 or 1835, I can distinctly remember that it meant to pilfer. A petty pilferer was a loafer, but in a very short time all the tribe of loungers in the sun, and the disreputable pickers up of considered trifles were called loafers. C. C. Leland.

Loaf-sugar (lōaf'shu-ēr), n. Sugar refined and formed into a conical mass.

Loam (lōm), n. [A. Sax. lām; D. leem, G. lehm, loam, clay, allied to E. lime, and probably L. limus, slime, mud.] 1. A native clay mixed with sand and occasionally with some carbonate of lime, or a soil compounded of various earths, of which the chief are siliceous sand, clay, and carbonate of lime or chalk, the clay predominating. Decayed vegetable and animal matter, in the form of humus, is often found in loams in considerable quantities, and the soil is fertile in proportion. Iron, magnesia, and various salts are occasionally found in loams.—2. A mixture of sand and clay, the former predominating, with a certain quantity of horse-dung, or some equivalent, as chopped straw, saw-dust, &c., added, used for moulding in iron-founding.

Loam (lōm), v. t. To cover with loam; to clay.

The loist ends and girders, which be in the walls, must be loamed all over to preserve them from the corroding of the mortar. Moxon.

Loamy (lōm'ī), a. Consisting of loam; partaking of the nature of loam, or resembling it; as, loamy soil.

Loan (lōn), n. [A. Sax. lōn, a loan, gift, contr. for lāhen, from līhan, to lend; Icel. lān, Dan. lān, D. leen, a loan. See LEND. The same root is in L. linguo, to leave (whence relinquish, &c.).] 1. The act of lending or condition of being lent; a lending; as, to arrange a loan.

To find, at some place I shall come at, arms On loan, or else for pledge. Tennyson.

2. That which is lent; anything furnished for temporary use to a person at his request, on the express or implied condition that the specific thing shall be returned, or its equivalent in kind; especially, a sum of money lent at interest.

Advantaging their loan with interest Of ten times double gain of happiness. Shak.

3. Permission to use; grant of the use; as, a loan of credit.—Public loan, the name given to money borrowed by the state at a fixed rate of interest.—Gratuitous loan, or commodate, in law, the gratuitous lending of an article to the borrower for his own use, which article must be used according to the lender's intention, and restored at the proper time and in proper condition.

Loan (lōn), v. t. [From the noun.] To lend. 'The practice of loaning money.' Westminister Rev. [Not much used in Britain.]

Loan (lōn), v. i. To lend, as money. [United States.]

A narrow inclosed way leading from a town or village, sometimes from one part of a village to another; a stretch of road between walls or hedges; a lane. [Scotch.]

Loanable (lōn'a-bl), a. That may be lent. [Rare.]

It is, therefore, so much subtracted from what may correctly be called the amount of loanable capital. J. S. Mill.

Loanmonger (lōn'mung-ēr), n. A dealer or jobber in loans.

Teach us, that taste is a talisman, which can do greater wonders than the millions of the loanmonger. Disraeli.

Loan-office (lōn'of-fis), n. 1. A public office in which loans of money are negotiated for the public, or in which the accounts of loans are kept and the interest paid to the lenders.—2. An office where money is lent upon goods or other property; a pawnbroker's place of business.

Loan-society (lōn'sō-si-e-ti), n. An institution established for the purpose of advancing money on loan to the industrious classes, and receiving back payment for the same by instalments, with interest.

Loasacææ, Loasææ (lō-a-zā'sē-ē, lō-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [Loasa, a South American name of these plants.] A small nat. order of American dicotyledonous plants belonging to Lindley's actal alliance, characterized by rigid, stinging hairs; hence called Chili nettles. The genus Loasa is the type. They have opposite or alternate lobed or pinnatifid leaves, and solitary or racemose white, yellow, or reddish (often very handsome) flowers. Bartonia aurea and some species of Mentzelia are in frequent cultivation.

Loath (lōth), a. [See LOTH.] Filled with disgust or aversion; unwilling; reluctant.

Loathe (lōth), v. t. pret. & pp. loathed; ppr. loathing. [A. Sax. lāthian, to hate. See LOTH.] 1. To feel disgust at; especially, to have an extreme aversion of the appetite to food or drink.

Loathing the honey'd cakes, I long for bread. Cowley.

2. To dislike greatly; to hate; to abhor.

Not to reveal the secret which I loathe. Waller.
She loathes the vital air. Dryden.

3. † To cause to hate or dislike; to disgust.

'(They) loath. men from reading by their covert, slanderous reproaches of the Scriptures. Abb. Parker.

Thou basely threw'st into lobspond. Hudibras.

Lobster (lob'stër), n. [A Sax. loppestere, lopystre, lopystre, corrupted from L. locusta, a kind of lobster or crayfish, also a locust.] The common name of the macrurus, decapodous, stalk-eyed crustaceans belonging to the genus Homarus. They have two pairs of antennæ, the outer pair remarkably long. The mouth, as in all crustaceans, is vertical, and furnished with jaws and foot-jaws. The first pair of ambulatory limbs bear the well-known and formidable lobster-claws. The fifth ring of the thorax is soldered to the carapace. The abdomen has rudimentary limbs on its under side, among which are lodged the newly excluded spawn. The tail consists of several flat shelly plates capable of being spread like a fan, and used as a swimming organ. When one of the limbs is broken off it will be reproduced in a few weeks, but the new one is never quite as large as the old one. They change their shell periodically. They inhabit the clearest water, living in the crevices of a rocky bottom. The common lobster (H. vulgaris) is found in great abundance on many of the European shores. Lobsters are esteemed a very rich and nourishing aliment, but dangerous unless fresh and in good condition. They are generally in their best season from the middle of October till the beginning of May. A species allied to ours is found on the coasts of North America. The sea crayfish, or spring lobster, is the Palinurus vulgaris of zoologists. The fresh-water lobster (Astacus fluviatilis) is called crawfish or crayfish, and is chiefly distinguished by having the fifth thoracic ring movable.

Lobster-moth (lob'stër-moth), n. See STATIROPHUS.

Lochial (lō'ki-āl), a. Pertaining to the lochia.

Lock (lok), n. [A Sax. loc, a lock or fastening of a door, an inclosure; lōcan, locan, to lock, to fasten; Icel. lok, a cover, shutter; loka, to close; lūka, to shut, to bring to an end; lykja, to lock, to shut in; Dan. lukke, D. luiken, to shut or close. Perhaps from root of L. ligare, to bind.] 1. Anything that fastens; specifically, an appliance used for fastening doors, chests, drawers, &c. A good lock is the masterpiece in smithery, and requires much art and delicacy in contriving and varying the wards, springs, bolts, and other parts of which it is composed, so as to adjust them to places where they are serviceable, and to the various occasions of their use. The principle upon which all locks depend is the application of a lever to an interior bolt, by means of a communication from without, so that by means of the latter the lever acts upon the bolt, and moves it in such a manner as to secure the door or lid from being opened by any pull or push from without. The security of locks in general, therefore, depends on the number of impediments that can be interposed between the lever (the key) and the bolt which secures the door, and these impediments are known by the name of wards (which slip into corresponding grooves of the key), the number and intricacy of which are supposed to distinguish a good lock from a bad one.—2. In firearms, as a rifle, musket, &c., the mechanism, or the portion comprising the mechanism, by which the piece is discharged.—3. A fastening together; a closing of one thing upon another; a state of being fixed or immovable; also, a grapple in wrestling; a hug. 'All Albemarle Street closed by a lock of carriages.' De Quincey.

They must be practised in all the locks and grips of wrestling, as need may often be in fight to tug or grapple, and to close.

Milton.

4. A place shut in or locked up; an inclosure; a lock-up.

Shuts up th' unwieldy centaur in the lock.

Dryden.

5. A barrier to confine the water of a stream or canal; an inclosure in a canal, with gates at each end, used in raising or lowering boats as they pass from one level to another. When a vessel is descending, water is let into the chambers of the locks till it is on a level with the higher water, and thus permits the vessel to enter; the upper gates are then closed, and by the lower gates being gradually opened, the water in the lock falls to the level of the lower water, and the vessel passes out. In ascending the operation is reversed.—Lock of water, the measure equal to the contents of the chamber of the locks by which the consumption of water on a canal is estimated.—Lock, stock, and barrel, the whole of a thing.

Lock (lok), v. t. 1. To fasten with a lock and key; as, to lock a door; to lock a trunk.—2. To fasten so as to impede motion; as, to lock a wheel.—3. To shut up or confine with, or as with, a lock, or in an inclosed place; as, to be locked in a prison; to lock money up in a box.

Then seek to know those things which make us blest, And having found them, lock them in thy breast.

Dehmann.

4. To close fast; to press together, as separate portions, closely; to seal; as, the frost locks up our rivers.

She locked her lips; she left me where I stood.

Tennyson.

5. To join or unite firmly, as by intertwin- ing or infolding; as, to lock arms.

Lock hand in hand; yourselves in order set.

Shak.

6. To embrace closely; as, to lock one in the arms.—7. To furnish with locks, as a canal.—8. In fencing, to seize, as the sword-arm of an antagonist by turning the left arm round it, after closing the passade, shell to shell, in order to disarm him.—To lock up, (a) to close or fasten with a lock. (b) To confine; to restrain.—To lock up a form, in printing, to fix the types or pages in a metal frame so as to prepare them for press, &c.

Lock (lok), v. i. 1. To become fast; as, the door locks close.—2. To unite closely by mutual insertion of parts.

Either they lock into each other, or slip one upon another's surface.

Boyle.

Lock (lok), n. [A Sax. loc, a lock of hair;

D. and Dan. lok, Icel. lokkr, G. locke, a curl or ringlet of hair. The further connections of the word are doubtful.] 1. A tuft of hair or wool; a tress; a ringlet.

A lock of hair will draw more than a cable rope.

Grav.

2. A tuft or small quantity of hay or other like substance.—3. A small quantity of anything; a handful; specifically, in Scots law, the perquisite of the servant in a mill, consisting of a small quantity of meal, regulated by the custom of the mill.

Lockage (lok'āj), n. 1. Materials for locks in a canal; works which form a lock on a canal.—2. Toll paid for passing the locks of a canal.—3. Elevation or amount of elevation and descent made by the locks of a canal.

The entire lockage will be about fifty feet on each side of the summit level.

Clinton.

Lock-band, Lock-bond (lok'band, lok'-bond), n. A course of bond stones.

Lock-chamber (lok'chām-bēr), n. In canals, the area of a lock inclosed by the side walls and gates.

Lock-down (lok-doun), n. A contrivance used by lumberers in America for fastening logs together in rafting.

Locked-jaw (lok't'ja), n. See LOCK-JAW.

Locker (lok'ēr), n. A close receptacle, as a drawer or a compartment in a ship, that may be closed with a lock; a small cupboard; a recess or niche, frequently observed near an altar in a Catholic church, and intended as a depository for water, oil, &c.—Boatswain's locker (navy), a chest in which are kept tools and small stuff for rigging.—Davy Jones' locker. See DAVY JONES.—A shot-locker (navy), a strong frame of plank near the pump-well in the hold, where shot are deposited.—Not a shot in the locker (navy), not a penny in the pocket.

Locker-up (lok'ēr-up), n. One that locks up; specifically, a jailer or turnkey.

Locket (lok'et), n. [Either a dim. from E. lock, or from Fr. loquet, a latch, dim. of O. Fr. loque, loc, a lock, which itself is from A. Sax. loc, E. lock.] 1. A small lock; a catch or spring to fasten a necklace or other ornament.—2. A little case worn as an ornament, often pendant to a necklace or watchguard.—3. That part of a sword scabbard where the hook is fastened.

Lockfast (lok'fast), a. In Scots law, secured or fastened by a lock, as a door, chest, press, &c.

Lock-gate (lok'gāt), n. A gate employed on rivers and canals for penning back the water and forming locks.

Locking-piece (lok'ing-plāt), n. In gunn. a thin flat piece of iron nailed on the sides of a field carriage to prevent the wood from wearing away.

Lockist (lok'ist), n. An adherent of Locke the philosopher.

Lock-jaw (lok'ja), n. In med. a form of tetanus consisting in spasmodic rigidity of the under jaw, due to spinal disturbance resulting from cold or a wound. It usually proves fatal. See TETANUS.

Lock-keeper (lok'kēp-er), n. One who attends the locks of a canal.

Lockless (lok'les), a. Destitute of a lock.

Lockman (lok'man), n. 1. The name formerly given in Scotland to the hangman or executioner of a town.—2. An officer in the Isle of Man who executes the orders of the governor; much like an under-sheriff.

Lock-out. See SUPP.

Lock-paddle (lok'pad-l), n. A small sluice that serves to fill and empty a lock.

Lock-piece (lok'pēs), n. In mining, a piece of timber used in supporting the workings.

Lockram (lok'ram), n. [From Loconan, a town in Bretagne where the fabric was manufactured.] A sort of coarse linen.

Lockrand (lok'rand), n. In arch. a course of bondstones.

Lock-sill (lok'sill), n. An angular piece of timber at the bottom of the lock of a canal, against which the gates shut.

Locksmith (lok'smith), n. An artificer whose occupation is to make locks.

Lock-spit (lok'spit), a. In fort. and rail. a small trench opened with a spade or plough to mark out the lines of any work: supposed to be derived from locus-pit.

Lock-step (lok'step), n. Milit. a mode of marching performed by a body of men arranged in as close file as possible, in which the leg of each person moves at the same time, and follows close on the movements of the corresponding leg of the person marching before him.

ch, chain; ch, Sc. lock; g, go; j, job;

h, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

Lock-stitch (lok'stich), n. A peculiar stitch formed by the locking of two threads together, so that it cannot be easily undone.

Lock-stitch (lok'stich), a. A term applied to a sewing-machine which forms its stitches by the locking of two threads together.

Lock-up (lok'up), n. A room or place in which persons under arrest are temporarily confined.

Lock-wear, Lock-weir (lok'wēr), n. A wear having a lock-chamber and gates.

Locky (lok'ī), a. Having locks or tufts. Sherwood. [Rare.]

Loco (lō'kō), n. In music, a direction that the notes are to be played exactly as they are written.

Lococession (lō-kō-se'shon), n. [L. locus, a place, and cedo, cessum, to yield.] The act of giving place. [Rare.]

Locodescriptive (lō-kō-dē-skrīp'tiv), a. [L. locus, a place, and E. descriptive.] Describing a particular place or places. Mauder. [Rare.]

Locofoco (lō-kō-fō'kō), n. [A word intended to mean self-lighting (L. focus, a fire), and modelled after locomotive on the supposition that the latter word meant self-moving.] A self-igniting cigar or match. This term was sportively applied to the extreme portion of the Democratic party in the United States, because, at a meeting in Tammany Hall, New York, at which there was a great diversity of sentiment, the chairman left his seat, and the lights were extinguished, with a view to dissolve the meeting; when those who were in favour of extreme measures produced locofoco matches, rekindled the lights, continued the meeting, and accomplished their immediate object. Hence, the American Democratic party got the name of locofocos, or the locofoco party.

You would find a locofoco majority as much addicted to class legislation as a factitious aristocracy. Disraeli.

Locomotion (lō-kō-mō'shon), n. [L. locus, place, and motio, motion.] 1. The act of moving from place to place.

An excursion to London, upon the footing that locomotion then was, when an hundred miles was a journey of three days, was a matter of some importance. Graves.

A clock, a mill, a lathe moves; but as no change of place of the machine is produced, such motion is not locomotion. Brande & Cox.

2. The power of moving from place to place; as, most animals possess locomotion; plants have life but not locomotion.

Locomotive (lō-kō-mō'tiv), a. 1. Moving from place to place; changing place, or able to change place; as, a locomotive animal.—2. Having the power to produce motion, or to move from place to place; as, a locomotive organ of the body; a locomotive engine.—Locomotive power, any kind of moving power, but especially steam, applied to the transport of loads on land. See RAILWAY.

Locomotive, Locomotive-engine (lō-kō-mō'tiv, lō-kō-mō'tiv-en-jin), n. Any engine which, being employed to draw loads from one place to another, travels with the load which it draws; especially, a movable steam-engine used for the traction of carriages on a railway, or a movable steam-carriage for passengers or goods, either upon a common road or on a railway.

Locomotive-car (lō-kō-mō'tiv-kār), n. A locomotive and a railway carriage combined in one. [United States.]

Locomotiveness, Locomotivity (lō-kō-mō'tiv-nes, lō-kō-mō'tiv-i-ti), n. The power of changing place. [Rare.]

Loculament (lok'ū-la-ment), n. [L. locula-mentum, from loculus, a cell, dim. of locus, a place.] In bot. the cell of a pericarp in which the seed is lodged. A pericarp is unilocular, bilocular, &c.

Locular (lok'ū-lēr), a. In bot. having one or more cells, as a pericarp.

Loculicidal (lok'ū-lī-sid'al), a. [L. loculus, a cell, and caedo, to cut.] In bot. a term applied to that mode of dehiscence which consists in ripened carpels splitting or dehiscing through their backs. Lindley.

Loculose, Loculous (lok'ū-lōs, lok'ū-lūs), a. In bot. divided by internal partitions into loculi or cells.

Loculicidal Dehiscence. a, Valves. b, c, Dissepiments. c, Axis.

Loculus (lok'ū-lūs), n. pl. Loculi (lok'ū-lī). [L., dim. of locus, a place.] A little cell, chamber, or compartment; any one of a series of little separate chambers, as in certain fruits, the test of some Foraminifera, &c.

Locum-tenens (lō-kum-tē-nenz), n. [L.] One who holds the place of another; a deputy or substitute.

Locus (lō'kus), n. pl. Loci (lō'sī). [L.] A place; specifically, (a) in geom. the line or surface traversed by a point which is constrained to move in accordance with certain determinate conditions; thus, the locus of a point which must preserve the same uniform distance from a fixed point is the surface of a sphere, but if the motion be at the same time confined to a plane, the locus will be a circle. (b) In optics, the figure formed by all the pencils of converging or diverging rays emanating from an object.—Locus delicti, a term in Scots law signifying the place where an offence is committed.—Locus poenitentiae, time of repentance before a probative writing is executed.—Locus sigilli, indicating the place of the seal, usually appended, with a party's signature, to a public document; usually abbreviated into L.S.—Locus standi, recognized place or position; the right of a party to appear and be heard on the question before any tribunal.

Locust (lō'kust), n. [L. locusta. Origin unknown.] 1. The common name of several insects belonging to the section Saltatoria, of the order Orthoptera, of which the genus Locusta is a type. They are allied to the grasshoppers and crickets, but differ from them in their antennae being shorter, and their bodies and limbs being more robust. Their hind-legs are large and powerful, which gives them a great power of leaping. Their mandibles and maxillæ are strong, sharp, and jagged, and their food consists of the leaves and green stalks of plants. They have coloured elytra and large wings disposed when at rest in straight folds. They fly well, but are often conveyed by winds where their inherent power could not have carried them. Their ravages are well known. Locusts are eaten in many countries roasted or fried. They are often preserved in lime or dried in the sun. The most celebrated species is the migratory locust (L. migratoria). It is about 2½ inches in length, greenish, with brown wing-covers marked with black. Migratory locusts are most usually found in Asia and Africa, where they frequently swarm in countless numbers, darkening the air in their excursions, and devouring every blade of the vegetation of the land they light on. In the United States the harvest-fly (Cicada) is called a locust.—2. See LOCUST-TREE.

Locust (Locusta migratoria).

Locusta (lō-kus'ta), n. [L.] In bot. (a) a term sometimes applied to the spikelet of grasses. (b) An inflorescence in which the flowers are sessile, and arranged upon a lengthened axis which is permanent.

Locustelle (lō-kus-tel'), n. A name given to some of the birds of the family Sylviidae, from their note resembling that of the grasshopper (the Locusta of some naturalists). Called also Grasshopper Warbler.

Locustidæ (lō-kus'tī-dē), n. pl. The locust family, a group of orthopterous insects belonging to the class Saltatoria. See LOCUST.

Locust-tree (lō-kus-trē), n. A tree, the Robinia pseud-acacia; also, Ceratonia Siliqua and Ceratonia Hymenæa Courbaril. The honey locust-tree is Gleditsia triacanthos; so called from the sweet pulp found between the seeds in the pod. See GLEDITSCHIA and HYMENÆA.

Locution (lō-kū'shon), n. [L. locutio, locution, a speaking, from loquor, to speak.] 1. A speaking; discourse.—2. An expression; a phrase. 'An erroneous locution.' Breen.

Locutory (lō-kū-to-rī), n. A room for conversation; especially, an apartment in a monastery, in which the monks were allowed to converse when silence was enjoined elsewhere.

Lodam (lō'dam), n. An old game at cards. She and I will take you at lodam. Heywood.

Lode (lōd), n. [A. Sax. lād, a way, a course, from lithan, to go by sea, intransitive corresponding to lædan, to lead. This word appears in composition in lodeman, loadsmen, loadstone, livelihood, &c.] 1. In mining, a metallic vein, or any regular vein or course, whether metallic or not, but commonly a metallic vein. The lodes containing metallic ores are said to be alive; others, which merely contain lapideous matters, are called dead lodes.—2. A reach of water; an open ditch for carrying off water from a fen.

Down that dark long lode . . . he and his brother skated home in triumph. Kingsley.

Lodeman,† Loadman† (lōd'man), n. [See LOADSMAN, LODGE.] A pilot; a loadsmen.

Lodemanager (lōd'man-āj), n. The hire of a lodeman or pilot for conducting a vessel from one place to another; pilotage.

Courts of lodemanager are held at Dover for the appointment of the Cinque Port pilots.

Dr. R. Morris.

Lode-ship† (lōd'ship), n. A small fishing-vessel.

Lodesman, n. See LODEMAN.

Lodestar (lōd'stār), n. Same as Loadstar.

Lodestone (lōd'stōn), n. 1. Same as Loadstone.—2. A name given by Cornish miners to a species of stone, called also Tinstone; a compound of stone and sand, of different kinds and colours.

Lodge (lōj), n. [Fr. loge; It. loggia, from L. laubia, lobia, &c., a cloister, from O.H.G. laubja, G. laube, an arbour. See LOBBY, which is really the same word in another form.] 1. A small house in a park, forest, or domain; a house of less pretensions and accommodation than a mansion; a temporary habitation, as that of the North American Indians; a hut.

O for a lodge in some vast wilderness! Cowper.

2. A small house or cottage connected with a larger; as, a porter's lodge.—3. A den; a cave; any place where a wild beast dwells. Smart.—4. A place where a society or branch of a society, as freemasons, holds its meetings; hence, the body of members themselves who meet at such a place.—5. A collection of objects situated close to each other.

The Maldives, a famous lodge of islands. Defoe.

Lodge (lōj), v.t. pret. & pp. lodged; ppr. lodging. [Fr. loger, to lodge. See the noun.] 1. To set, lay, or deposit for keeping or preservation for a longer or shorter time; as, to lodge money in a bank; the men lodged their arms in the arsenal.—2. To plant; to infix; to fix or settle; as, to lodge an arrow in one's breast.

So can I give no reason
More than a lodged hate. Shak.

3. To furnish with a temporary habitation; to provide with a transient or temporary place of abode; to harbour; to cover. 'The deer is lodged.' Addison.

I've often wished that I had clear,
For life, six hundred pounds a year,
A handsome house to lodge a friend,
A river at my garden's end. Swift.

4. To beat down; to lay flat.

Though bladed corn be lodged, and trees blown down;
Though castles topple on their warders' heads.

Lodge (lōj), v.i. 1. To be deposited or fixed; to settle; as, a falling stone lodged on the roof.—2. To reside; to dwell; to have a fixed position.

And dwells such age in softest bosoms then?
And lodge such daring souls in little men? Pope.

3. To have a temporary abode; to dwell at some one else's house; as, we lodged a night at the Golden Ball.

He lodgeth with one Simon a tanner. Acts x. 6.

4. To be beaten down or laid flat, as grain; as, wheat and oats on strong land are apt to lodge.

Its straw makes it not subject to lodge, or to be mildewed. Mortimer.

Lodgeable (lōj'a-bl), a. Capable of affording a temporary abode.

'The lodgeable area of the earth.' Jeffrey. [Rare.]

Lodged (lōjd), p. and a. In her. a term used for the buck, hart, hind, &c., when at rest and lying on the ground.

Lodgement (lōj'ment), n. Same as Lodgment.

Lodger (lōj'ēr), n. One who lodges; especially, one who lives in a hired room or rooms in the house of another.

Lodged.

Lodging (loj'ing), n. 1. A place of rest for a night or of residence for a time; temporary habitation; especially, a room or rooms hired for residence in the house of another; often used in this sense in the plural with a singular meaning.

Wits take lodgings in the sound of Bow. Pope.

2. Place of residence; harbour; cover.

Fair bosom . . . the lodging of delight. Spenser.

3. Convenience to repose or sleep on.

Their feathers serve to stuff our beds and pillows, yielding us soft and warm lodging. Ray.

Lodging-house (loj'ing-hous), n. A house in which lodgings are let; generally a place where travellers lodge other than an inn or hotel.

Lodging-money (loj'ing-mun-i), n. Allowance granted for lodgings, as an allowance in the British army granted to officers and others, for whom suitable quarters cannot be provided in barracks.

Lodgment (loj'ment), n. 1. The act of lodging or the state of being lodged; a being placed or deposited at rest for keeping for a time or for permanence; as, the lodgment of money in a bank.—2. Accumulation or collection of something deposited and remaining at rest; as, the lodgment of mud in a tank.—3. A place where persons or things are lodged; a room; a chamber. Pope.—4. Milit. the occupation of a position, as in a siege, by the besieging party, and the formation of an intrenchment thereon to maintain it against recapture.

Lodicule (lō'di-kūl), n. [L. lodicula, a coverlet.] In bot. a name applied to the scales which occur at the base of the fruit of grasses. The cut shows the flower of the wheat plant dissected: o, pistil; s, stamens; l, lodicules; p, paleæ; g, glumes.

Lodicules.

Loess (lō'es or lēs), n. [G. loess, loess.] A German geological term, applied to a fine loamy deposit of pleistocene age, which occurs in the valleys of the Rhine and Danube, and abundantly in Northern China. It is a pulverulent loam of a yellowish or light-brown colour, consisting chiefly of argillaceous matter, combined with particles of quartz, mica, carbonate of lime, &c., as well as animal remains. Its origin is not determined.

Loffet (lof), v.i. To laugh. Shak.

Loft (loft), n. [From same root as the verb lift (which see) and A. Sax. lyft, Sc. lyft, air, sky, perhaps directly from the Scandinavian, the word occurring with same meaning and form in Dan. lyft, a ceiling, loft; the Icel. form is loft (pron. loft), the air, the sky, a loft or upper room. Vigfusson thinks that the latter may perhaps be the primitive meaning, that of air or sky being derived from the notion that the heavens formed a kind of ceiling; comp. heaven. The Icel. a loft corresponds to E. a-loft.] 1. The room or space between a ceiling or flooring and the roof immediately above it; the space below and between the rafters; also a gallery or apartment, raised within a larger apartment, as in a church, hall, &c.

I also to the ball, and with much ado got up to the loft, where with much trouble I could see very well. Pepys.

2.† A floor or room above another; a story. Eutychus. . . fell down from the third loft and was taken up dead. Acts xx. 9.

Loft,† adv. Highly.—On loft, on high; aloft. Chaucer.

Loftily (loft'i-lī), adv. In a lofty manner or position; in an elevated place; on high; fig. in a proud or arrogant manner; haughtily; proudly.

Did ever any conqueror, loftily seated in his triumphal chariot, yield a spectacle so gallant. Barrow.

Loftiness (loft'i-nes), n. The state or quality of being lofty or high; height; elevation; elevation of character or sentiment; the state of being elevated or puffed up by pride or vanity; grandeur; sublimity; haughtiness; arrogance.

We have heard the pride of Moab . . . his loftiness and his arrogancy. Jer. xlviii. 29.

Three poets in three distant ages born: . . . The first in loftiness of thought surpass'd; The next in majesty; in both the last. Dryden.

Lofty (loft'i), a. [From the stem loft (which see).] Comp. A. Sax. lyften, G. luftig, aerial, lofty.] 1. Lifted high up; much elevated in place; high; as, a lofty tower; a lofty mountain.

See lofty Lebanon his head advance. Pope.

2. Elevated in condition or character; dignified.

Thus saith the high and lofty One, that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy. Is. lviii. 15.

3. Indicative of pride or haughtiness; proud; haughty; as, lofty looks.

He was a scholar, and a ripe and good one; Exceeding wise, fair spoken, and persuading; Lofty and sour to them that lov'd him not. Shak.

4. Elevated in language or style; sublime; as, lofty strains; lofty rhyme.—5. Stately; dignified; as, lofty steps.—SYN. High, tall, exalted, dignified, stately, majestic, sublime, proud, haughty.

Log (log), n. [Icel. lög, a felled tree; allied perhaps to D. log, heavy, unwieldy. The word has the same form in Dutch, Danish, and German, but only the second meaning.] 1. A bulky piece or stick of timber unhewed.

2. Naut. an apparatus for measuring the rate of a ship's velocity through the water. The common log is a piece of board, forming the quadrant of a circle of about 6 inches radius, balanced by a small plate of lead nailed on the circular part, so as to swim perpendicularly in the water, with about two-thirds immersed under the surface. One end of a line, called the log-line, is fastened to the log, while the other is wound round a reel in the gallery of the ship. When at any time the log is thrown out of the ship while sailing, as soon as it touches the water it ceases to partake of the ship's motion, so that the ship goes on and leaves it behind, while the line is unwound from the reel, and the length of line unwound in a given time gives the rate of the ship's sailing. This is calculated by knots made on the line at certain distances, while the time is measured by a sand-glass of a certain number of seconds. The length between the knots is so proportioned to the time of the glass that the number of knots unwound while the glass runs down shows the number of miles the ship is sailing per hour. Thus, if the glass be a half-minute one, it will run down 120 times in an hour. Now, since a nautical mile has a length of 6080 feet, the 120th part of this is just 50½ feet; so that if the spaces between the knots be 50½ feet, the number of knots and parts of a knot unwound from the reel in half a minute is the number of miles and parts of a mile the ship runs in one hour. The part of the line between the log and the first knot (about 5 fathoms) is called the stray-line.

I did here for my own satisfaction try the swiftness of one of them. Sailing by our log we had twelve knots on our reel and she ran it all out before the half-minute glass was half out; which, if it had been no more, is after the rate of 12 mile an hour. Dampier.

Hence—3. The record of a ship's progress; a log-book. See Log-book.

Log (log), v.i. In the United States, to cut down and get out pine-logs for sawing into boards, &c.

Log (log), n. [Heb. log, from lög, to be hollow.] A Hebrew measure of liquids, containing according to some authors three-quarters of a pint, according to others five-sixths of a pint. According to Arbuthnot, it was the seventy-second part of the bath or ephah, and the twelfth part of a hin.

A meat-offering mingled with oil, and one log of oil. Lev. xiv. 10.

Log† (log), v.i. [Comp. Prov. E. logger, to move irregularly, as a wheel loose on its axis; Dan. logre, to wag the tail; perhaps allied to lag.] To move to and fro; to rock.

Logan, Loggan (log'an), n. [From log, to rock.] A rocking-stone; a large stone or rock so balanced as to be easily moved. Written also Loggan-stone. See ROCKING-STONE.

Loganiaceæ (lō'gan-i-ā's-sē-ē), n. pl. [After J. Logan, a distinguished botanist.] A natural order of tropical dicotyledonous plants, consisting of trees, shrubs, and herbaceous plants, some of which, as the members of the genus Strychnos, are remarkable for their poisonous qualities. They have opposite, entire, stipulate leaves, calyx four-or five-parted, corolla four-, five-, or ten-cleft, and stamens varying in number.

Logædic (log-a-ēd'ik), a. [Gr. logaoidikos, from logos, speech, prose, and oïdē, song.] A term applied in Greek prosody to verses in which the dactylic measure passes into the trochaic, in such a manner that their rhythm resembles that of ordinary speech.

Logarithm (log'a-rithm), n. [Fr. logarithme; Gr. logos, ratio, and arithmos, number.] The exponent of the power to which a given invariable number must be raised in order to produce another given number. Thus, in the common system of logarithms, in which the invariable number is 10, the logarithm of 1000 is 3, because 10 raised to the third power is 1000. In general, if $ax=y$, in which equation a is a given invariable number, then x is the logarithm of y . The invariable number is called the base of the system of logarithms. When the logarithms form a series in arithmetical progression, the corresponding natural numbers form a series in geometrical progression. Thus in the common system,

Logarithms, . . 0 1 2 3 4 5
Natural numbers, 1 10 100 1000 10000 100000

Hence the logarithm of 1 is 0; the logarithm of 10 is 1; of 100, 2; of 1000, 3; and so on. The logarithms of numbers between 1 and 10 will consist of a decimal; those of numbers between 10 and 100 will consist of the integer 1 with some decimal; those of numbers between 100 and 1000 will consist of the integer 2 with some decimal; and so on. The integral part of a logarithm is called its index, and the number of units in the index is always less by 1 than the number of integer places in the number corresponding, or the number of integer places in any given number is always 1 more than the number of units in the index of its logarithm. Thus, the index of the logarithm of 5 is 0; of 25, 1; of 225, 2; and so on. The logarithms of decimals have negative indices, and the number of units in the index is always 1 greater than the number of ciphers immediately following the decimal point. Thus the index of the logarithm of .5 is -1; of .05, -2; of .005, -3. Logarithms are of great importance in facilitating the arithmetical operations of multiplication and division, involution and evolution; for the addition and subtraction of logarithms answer to the multiplication and division of their natural numbers. In like manner involution is performed by multiplying the logarithm of any number by the number denoting the required power; and evolution, by dividing the logarithm by the number denoting the required root. Logarithms are also of great value in trigonometrical and astronomical calculations; but for such calculations tables are required, both for logarithms of the natural numbers and for those of the sines, co-sines, tangents, co-tangents, secants, and co-secants, for every minute of the quadrant. Logarithms were invented about 1614 by John Napier of Merchiston, in Scotland; but the kind now chiefly in use were invented by Henry Briggs, professor of geometry in Gresham College at Oxford.—Arithmetical complement of a logarithm, the difference between the given logarithm and 10.—Hyperbolic or Napierian logarithms, those computed by John Speidell on the same base as that adopted by the inventor Napier, and so called because they are analogous to the areas of a right-angled hyperbola, between the asymptotes and the curve. The base is equal to 2.718281828 very nearly. The logarithms computed by Napier himself were only for sines, cosines, and the other functions of angles.

Logarithmic, Logarithmical (log'a-rith-met'ik, log'a-rith-met'ik-al), a. Same as Logarithmic. [Rare.]

Logarithmically (log'a-rith-met'ik-al-lī), adv. Same as Logarithmically. [Rare.]

Logarithmic, Logarithmical (log'a-rith-mik, log'a-rith-mik-al), a. Pertaining to logarithms; consisting of logarithms.—Logarithmic or logistic curve, a curve so called from its properties and uses in explaining and constructing logarithms, because its ordinates are in geometrical progression, while the abscissas are in arithmetical progression; so that the abscissas are as the logarithms of the corresponding ordinates.—Logarithmic spiral or logistic spiral, a curve-line somewhat analogous to the common logarithmic curve. It intersects all its radiants at the same angle, and this angle is the modulus of the system of logarithms which the particular spiral represents. Its involute and evolute are the same curve with itself.

Logarithmically (log-a-rith'mik-al-li), adv. By the use or aid of logarithms.

Log-board (log'bôrd), n. Naut. Two boards, shutting like a book and divided into columns, in which for all the hours of the day and night are written down the direction of the wind, course of the ship, &c., these entries being afterwards transferred to the log-book. The entries on the log-board are made with chalk and rubbed out every day at noon. A slate is now, however, commonly used instead.

Log-book (log'buk), n. 1. Naut. a book into which are transcribed the contents of the log-board or log-slate with any other particulars relating to the vessel's voyage that are considered worthy of being registered, such as the misconduct of any of the crew, assistance lent to a vessel in distress, or the like. Often simply Log.—2. A book for memoranda kept by a public teacher.

Log-cabin (log'kab-in), n. A house or hut whose walls are composed of logs laid on each other, such as are often constructed in new-settled regions where timber is plentiful.

Log-canoe (log'ka-nô), n. A canoe hollowed out of a single log. See CANOE.

Log-chip, Log-ship (log'chip, log'ship), n. The board, in the form of a quadrant, attached to the log-line. See LOG.

Loge, † n. [Fr.] A lodge; habitation. Chaucer.

Loggan (log'an), n. Same as Logan.

Loggati (log'at), n. [Dim. from log.] 1. A small log or piece of wood. B. Jonson.—2. pl. The name of an ancient English game, played by fixing a stake in the ground and pitching small pieces of wood at it, the nearest thrower winning. It was prohibited by stat. 33 Henry VIII. ix. Shak.

I have seen it (loggats) played in different counties, at their sheep-shearing feasts, where the winner was entitled to a black fleece, which he afterwards presented to the maid to spin, for the purpose of making a petticoat, and on condition that she knelt down on the fleece to be kissed by all the rusticus present. Stevens.

Logged, † pp. Lodged. Chaucer.

Logged (logd), p. and a. 1. Fastened with logs. [North American].—2. Naut. water-logged (which see).

Logger (log'er), n. In the United States, a person employed to procure logs or timber.

Loggerhead (log'er-hed), n. [Log and head.] 1. A blockhead; a dunce; a dolt; a thick-skull.—2. A spherical mass of iron with a long handle, used to heat tar.—3. A species of turtle found in the south seas (the Caouia caretta). It is a large fierce animal, biting furiously when attacked.—4. A timber-head in a whale-boat for veering out lines when fast to a whale.—5. In the West Indies, the name given to two or three species of fly-catchers.—To fall to loggerheads or to go to loggerheads, to come to blows.—To be at loggerheads, to be engaged in a fight; to be involved in a dispute.

Loggerheaded (log'er-hed-ed), a. Dull; stupid; doltish.

You loggerheaded and unpolished grooms!
What, no attendance? Shak.

Loggia (loj'ä), n. pl. Loggie (loj'e). [It. See LOGGE.] In Italian arch. (a) a term applied to a gallery or arcade in a building, sometimes on the level of the ground, at other times at the height of one or more stories, running along the front or part of the front of the building and open on one side to the air, on which side are a series of pillars or slender piers. Such galleries afford an airy and sheltered resting-place or outlook. They are very characteristic of Italian palaces. Among famous loggie are those of the Vatican, decorated by Raffael and his scholars, and the Loggia de' Lanzi at Florence. The name is also given to a belvedere. (b) A large ornamental window in the middle of the chief story of a building, often projecting from the wall, as seen in old Venetian palaces.

Logging, † n. A lodging. Chaucer.

Log-glass (log'glas), n. Naut. the sand-glass used in heaving the log to obtain the rate of sailing. It is commonly a half-minute or a 28-seconds glass for slow sailing, and 14-seconds for fast sailing.

Log-heap (log'hép), n. A pile of logs for burning in clearing land.

Log-house, Log-hut (log'hous, log'hut), n. Same as Log-cabin.

Logic (loj'ik), n. [Fr. logique; L. logica; Gr. logiké, from logos, reason.] 1. The science of reasoning; the science of the operations of the understanding subservient to the estimation of evidence, including both the process itself of advancing from known truths or admitted propositions to unknown truths or propositions not previously admitted, and all intellectual operations, such as classifying and judging, subsidiary to this; the science whose chief end is to ascertain the principles on which all valid reasoning depends, and which may be applied as tests of the legitimacy of every conclusion that is drawn from premises.

Logic is the science of the laws of thought, as thought; that is, of the necessary conditions to which thought, considered in itself, is subject.

Sir W. Hamilton.

By logic has generally been meant a system which teaches us so to arrange our reasonings that their truth or falsehood shall be evident in their form. Wheatell.

Logic . . . is not the science of belief, but the science of proof or evidence. In so far as belief professes to be founded on proof, the office of logic is to supply a test for ascertaining whether or not the belief is well grounded. J. S. Mill.

2. Reasoning; the practice of reasoning; as, the author is guilty of much bad logic.—Deductive logic, the science which treats of deductive reasoning. See under DEDUCTIVE.

—Inductive logic, the science which treats of inductive reasoning. See INDUCTION.—Pure logic, the science of logic proper, as distinguished either from applied logic, which is the science of logic as applied to some special branch of inquiry or field of investigation; or from modified logic, which treats of the practice of reasoning as modified by the mental constitution of man generally or particular individuals, or the practice of reasoning in relation to those circumstances which are likely to lead men into error in reasoning.

Logical (loj'ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to logic; used in logic; taught in logic; as, logical subtleties.—2. According to the rules or principles of logic; as, a logical argument or inference; this reasoning is strictly logical.

A process of logical reasoning has been often likened to a chain supporting a weight. Stewart.

3. Skilled in logic; furnished with logic; discriminating; as, a logical mind.

Logically (loj'ik-al-li), adv. According to the rules or principles of logic; as, to argue logically.

Logician (loj-i'shan), n. A person skilled in logic; a teacher or professor of logic; an able arguer.

Each fierce logician still expelling Locke. Pope.

Logicise (loj-i-siz), v. i. To exercise one's logical powers.

Intellect is not speaking and logicising; it is seeing and ascertaining. Carlyle.

Logics† (loj'iks), n. Used for Logic.

Logie (lô'gi), n. A bit of hollowed-out pewter polished in various concavities and used as theatrical jewelry. [Theatrical slang.]

Logistic, Logistical (lô-jis'tik, lô-jis'tik-al), a. 1.† Logical. Berkeley.—2. In math. relating to logistics; sexagesimal; as, logistic arithmetic.—Logistic or proportional logarithms, certain logarithms of sexagesimal fractions useful in astronomical calculations. They are constructed for the purpose of simplifying the process of finding a fourth proportional where the first term is always the same. By the ordinary logarithmic tables it would be necessary in such a case first to find the logarithms of the second and third terms and add them together, and then to subtract the logarithm of the first, by which the logarithm of the fourth is determined. But in tables of logistic logarithms the figures given are the excesses of the logarithm of the first term over the logarithms of the numbers that may form the second and third terms; so that the process is reduced to adding the logistic logarithms of the second and third terms, which gives the logistic logarithm of the fourth. Tables of logistic logarithms were formerly used in connection with the old Nautical Almanac for simplifying astronomical calculations at sea; but they are now almost entirely disused, tables being now compiled that make it quite as convenient to use the common logarithms.

Logistics (lô-jis'tiks), n. 1. A name sometimes employed for the arithmetic of sexagesimal fractions, used in astronomical computations. Called also Logistical Arithmetic.—2. Milit. that branch of military science which takes cognizance of the comparative warlike resources and capabilities of countries between which war is likely to arise, as well as of all the conditions under which it is likely to be conducted, as the geographical features, climate, means of transit, food resources, &c., of the probable seat of war.

Log-line (log'lin), n. Naut. a line or cord about 150 fathoms in length, fastened to the log by means of two legs, and wound on a reel, called the log-reel. See LOG.

Logman (log'man), n. 1. A man who carries logs. Shak.—2. One whose occupation is to cut and convey logs to a mill. [United States.]

Logocracy (lô-gôk'ra-si), n. [Gr. logos, a word, and krateo, to rule.] Government by the power of words.

Logodædaly (lô-gô-dê-da-li), n. [Gr. logos, a word, and daidalos, skillfully or curiously wrought.] Verbal legerdemain; a playing with words, as by passing from one meaning of them to another. [Rare.]

For one instance of mere logomachy, I could bring ten instances of logodædaly or verbal legerdemain. Coleridge.

Logogram (lô-gô-gram), n. [Gr. logos, a word, and gramma, a letter, from graphein, to write.] 1. In phonography, a word-letter; a phonogram that, for the sake of brevity, represents a word; as, |, that is, t, for it.—2. A set of verses forming a puzzle. The verses contain words synonymous with certain others formed from the transposition of the letters of an original word, which last it is the object to find out. Thus out of the word certain many shorter words may be formed, as cur, curt, nut, tin, tarn, &c., of which dog, short, shell-fruit, white-metal, mountain-lake, &c., may be regarded as synonyms. These latter synonyms then are introduced into the poem, and from these the primary synonyms (cur, curt, &c.) are to be guessed, and from them again certain itself.

Logographer (lô-gôg'ra-fér), n. One skilled in logography.

Logographic, Logographical (lô-gô-graf'ik, lô-gô-graf'ik-al), a. Pertaining to logography.

Logography (lô-gôg'ra-fi), n. [Gr. logos, a word, and graphie, a writing.] 1. A method of printing, in which a type represents a word, instead of forming a letter.—2. A system, formerly attempted, of taking down the words of an orator without having recourse to short-hand, a number of reporters acting at once, each of whom in succession took down a few words.

Logogryph, † Logogryph† (lô-gô-grif), n. [Gr. logos, a word, and grifhos, a fishing-net, anything intricate.] A sort of riddle.

Logomachist (lō-gom'a-kist), n. One who contends about words.

Logomachy (lō-gom'a-ki), n. [Gr. logos, word, and machē, contest, altercation.] Contention in words merely, or rather a contention about words; a war of words.

How it (genius or originality) disconcerts society, interrupts the tranquil course of its vegetation, perplexes the methodical logomachy of parties.

Macmillan's Mag.

Logomania (lō-gō-mā'ni-a), n. [Gr. logos, a word, and mania, madness.] A disease of the faculty of language generally associated with organic disease of the nervous structure, as in paralysis. In this disease, while conceptions and ideas remain clear, the power of associating these with the words by which they are expressed is lost, and the patient can either not give any names to his conceptions at all or expresses them erroneously. Sometimes one class of words is lost and others retained. Thus a patient may forget his own name, or nouns only, and remember all other words. Sometimes he forgets only parts of the word, as terminations, and not unfrequently in another form of the disease he inverts his phrases.

Logometer (lō-gom'et-ēr), n. [Gr. logos, ratio, and metron, a measure.] A scale for measuring chemical equivalents.

Logometric, Logometrical (lō-gō-met'rik, lō-gō-met'rik-al), a. Used to measure or ascertain chemical equivalents; pertaining to a logometer; as, a logometric scale.

Logos (log'os), n. [Gr., word, speech, reason, from legō, to speak.] The Word; the Divine Word; Christ.

Logothete (log'ō-thet), n. [Gr. logos, a word, account, and tithēnē, to place.] Properly, an accountant; hence, an officer of the Byzantine Empire, who might be either (a) the public treasurer; (b) the head of any administrative department; or (c) the chancellor of the empire. Gibbon.

Logotype (log'ō-tip), n. [Gr. logos, a word, and typos, impression.] A name given to two or more letters cast in one piece, as f, ff, æ, œ, &c.

Log-reel (log'rēl), n. Naut. a reel on which the log-line is wound. See Log.

Log-roll (log'rōl), v.i. [United States.] 1. To join in rolling and collecting logs for burning or lumber. Hence—2. To give mutual assistance in carrying legislative or other measures; to give aid mutually by puffery.

Log-ship (log'ship). See LOG-CHIP.

Log-slate. See LOG-BOOK.

Logthing (log'ting), n. [Icel. lög, law, and thing, assembly.] The legislative portion of the Norwegian storting or diet, consisting of one-fourth of the members of the storting, who sit apart from the other three-fourths constituting the odelsting or representatives of landed property. The members of the logthing form, together with the highest judicial authorities, the supreme court of the kingdom.

Logwood (log'wud), n. [From being imported in logs.] The popular English name of Hæmatexylon campechianum, a tree found very commonly in many parts of the West Indies, where it has been introduced from the adjoining continent, especially Logwood (Hæmatexylon campechianum).

Honduras, on which account it has been called Campeachy-wood. It belongs to the nat. order Leguminosæ, sub-order Cæsalpinea. This tree has a crooked, deformed stem, growing to the height of 20 to 40 feet, with crooked irregular branches armed with strong thorns. The wood is of a firm texture and a red colour, and so heavy as to sink in water. It is much used in dyeing, and its colouring matter is derived from a principle called hematine or hematoxyline. Logwood contains, besides, resin, oil, acetic acid, salts of potash, a little sulphate of lime, alumina, peroxide of iron, and manganese. It is employed in calico-printing to give a black or brown colour, and also in the preparation of some lakes. An extract of logwood is used in medicine as an astringent.

Lohoch, Lohock (lō'hok), n. A medicine of a middle consistence between a soft electuary and a syrup. See LOCH.

Loimic (loim'ik), a. [Gr. loimos, contagious matter.] Relating to the plague or contagious disorders.

Loin (loin), n. [O. Fr. logne; Fr. longe, a loin, as of veal, lombes, the loins, from L. lumbus, the loin. The O.E. lend, A. Sax. lend, lenden (G. and D. lende, Icel. and Dan. lend), the loin, has disappeared in favour of this word, the more readily probably from a certain similarity of form.] The part of an animal which lies between the lowest of the false ribs and the upper portion of the ossa ilium or haunch bone, or one of the lateral portions of the lumbar region. The loins are also called the Reins.

Loiter (loit'ēr), v.i. [Allied to D. leuteren, to vacillate or waver; perhaps to Icel. lod-dari, a loiterer; it may be connected with late, like Icel. lotra, latra, to loiter or linger, from latr, late; comp. E. linger, from long. Skeat takes it from the same root as lout (which see).] To linger; to be slow in moving; to delay; to be dilatory; to spend time idly.

Where have you been these two days loitering? Shak.

SYN. To linger, delay, lag, tarry.

Loiter (loit'ēr), v.t. To consume in trifles; to waste carelessly: used with away; as, he loitered away most of his leisure.

Loiterer (loit'ēr-ēr), n. A lingerer; one that delays or is slow in motion; an idler; one that is sluggish or dilatory.

Ever listless loiterers, that attend

No cause, no trust, no duty, and no friend. Pope.

Loiteringly (loit'ēr-ing-li), adv. In a loitering manner.

Lok, Lök (lok, lō'ki), n. [Icel., signifying originally a deceiver, from lokka, G. locken, to lure, to entice.] In the Scandinavian myth, the evil deity, the author of all calamities. He is said to be the father of Hela, goddess of the lower regions.

Loke (lōk), n. [Allied to lock, A. Sax. locan, to shut.] [Provincial.] 1. A wicket or hatch. 2. A private road or path. Halliwell.—3. A close narrow lane.

Loke, † n. A lock of hair or wool. Drayton.

Loke, † v.t. To see; to look upon. Chaucer.

Loken, † Loke, † pp. of lock or loke. Looked; shut close. Chaucer.

Loligide (lo-lif'i-dē), n. pl. [See LOLIGO.] Carpenter's name for the family Teuthidæ, comprising the calamaries or squids. See TEUTHIDÆ.

Loligo (lo-lif'ō), n. [L., a cuttle-fish.] A genus of cuttlefishes. See CALAMARY.

Lolium (lō-li-um), n. [L.] A genus of grasses of the tribe Hordeæ, containing a few species common in many parts of the northern hemisphere. One species (L. perenne) is the common rye-grass of the farmer, one of the most valuable of our pasture grasses; another species is L. temulentum, or darnel, which was long believed to have poisonous narcotic qualities; these, however, are now shown to have no existence in fact.

Loll (lol), v.i. [Icel. lulla, to loll, lulla, to toddle as a child beginning to walk. Wedgwood thinks the original idea is that of lolling or lolling out the tongue, whence the idea of imperfect speech (as in Bavarian lallen, to speak thick), and lastly of imperfect action.] 1. To lie at ease; to lie in a careless attitude; to recline; to lean.

Void of care, he lolls supine in state. Dryden.

2. To hang extended from the mouth, as the tongue of an ox or a dog when heated with labour or exertion.

The triple porter of the Stygian seat,
With lolling tongue lay fawning at thy feet. Dryden.

3. To suffer the tongue to hang extended from the mouth: said of the animal that does so.

Loll (lol), v.t. To suffer to hang out, as the tongue.

Fierce tigers couched around, and loll'd their fawning tongues. Dryden.

Lollard (lōl'ārd), n. [Either from loll, and meaning originally a lazy fellow, a sluggard, or from L.G. lollen, lullen, to sing softly, from the practice of the original Lollards of singing dirges at funerals. Others derive the term from an early German reformer of the name of Lollard or Lothardus, who was burned at Cologne in 1351.] 1. One of a semi-monastic society for the care of the sick and the burial of the dead, originating at Antwerp about 1300, and not quite extinct yet. They were blamed for holding heretical opinions, and hence perhaps the application of the term in the following sense.—2. One of the followers of Wickliffe in England, who were persecuted in the reigns of Henry IV. and Henry V.

Dr. Wiclif dying at Lutterworth, Dec. 31, 1384, his followers were soon after distinguished, or rather reproached, by the nickname of Lollards. Lewis.

Lollardism, Lollardy (lōl'ārd-izm, lōl'ārd-i), n. The principles or doctrines of the Lollards.

The spirit of Popery, not Christianity, was to be seen in the zeal of the enemies to Lollardy. Young.

Loller, † n. A Lollard. Chaucer.

Lollingly (lōl'ing-li), adv. In a lolling manner.

She (Doorga) has four arms, with one of which she carries the skull of a giant; her tongue protrudes, and hangs lollingly from the mouth. Buckle.

Lollipop (lōl'i-pop), n. [Explained by Wedgwood as meaning a dainty for sucking, from stem of E. loll, lill, to protrude the tongue, and pop, papa, 'the infantine expression for eating.' Comp. L.G. zuckerpoppe, sweetmeats. Lolly seems to mean a soft kind of food, as in lollololy, and pop is probably the same as pap, infants' food.] A kind of sugar confectionery which dissolves easily in the mouth.

Lollop (lō'lop), v.i. [From loll.] To loll; to move heavily; to lounge. [Colloq.]

Lomaria (lō-mā'ri-a), n. [Gr. lōma, a hem, fringe, or border.] A genus of ferns closely allied to the blechnums, from which it is distinguished by having the sori situated along the margin of the fronds, while in the blechnums they are situated within the margin.

Lombard (lōm'bārd), n. [L.L. Longobardi, generally translated as Long beards, being regarded as a latinized form of the German words for long and beard. Another etymology is G. lang or L. longus, long, and O.H.G. barte, part, a battle-axe. Comp. halbert, partisan. But see the following extract.

Paulus Diaconus, who was a Lombard by birth, derives their name of Longobardi from their long beards; but modern critics reject this etymology, and suppose the name to have reference to their dwelling on the banks of the Elbe, inasmuch as Börde signifies in Low German a fertile plain on the bank of a river, and there is still a district in Magdeburg called the lange Börde. Smith's Class. Dict.

1. A native of Lombardy in Italy.—2. † A banker or money-lender: so called because this profession was first exercised in London by natives of Lombardy.—3. Milit. a kind of cannon formerly used.—Lombard Street, a street in London where a large number of the principal bankers, money-brokers, and bullion-dealers have their offices; hence, the money market or the moneyed interest of London.

Lombard, Lombard-house (lōm'bārd, lōm'bārd-house), n. A public institution for lending money to the poor at a moderate interest upon articles deposited and pledged. Called also Mont-de-piété.

Lombard (lōm'bārd), a. Of or pertaining to Lombardy or the Lombards.—Lombard architecture, the form which the Romanesque style of architecture assumed under the hands of the Gothic invaders and colonists of the north of Italy, comprising the buildings erected from about the beginning of the ninth to the beginning of the thirteenth century. It forms a connecting link between the romanized architecture of Italy and the Gothic of more northern countries. The most characteristic feature of the churches built in this style is the general introduction and artistic development of the vault, that feature which afterwards became the formative principle of the whole Gothic style. In the Lombard architecture also pillars consisting of several shafts arranged round a central mass, and buttresses of small projection, appear to have been first employed. The tendency to the prevalence of vertical lines throughout the design, instead of the horizontal lines of the classic architecture, is also characteristic, as well as the use of the dome to surmount the intersection of the choir nave and transepts. See also extract below.

Generally speaking the most beautiful part of a Lombard church is its eastern end. The apse with its gallery, the transepts, and, above all, the dome that almost invariably surmounts their intersection with the choir, constitute a group which always has a pleasing effect, and is very often highly artistic and beautiful.

J. Ferguson.

Lombardeer† (lom'bārd-ēr), n. A Lombard or pawnbroker. Houell.

Lombardic (lom-bārd'ik), a. Pertaining to Lombardy or the Lombards. — Lombardic alphabet, an alphabet derived from the Roman, and employed in the manuscripts of Italy.

Loment, Lomentum (lō'ment, lō-men'tum), n. In bot. an indehiscent legume which separates spontaneously by a transverse articulation between each seed.

Loment of Sainfoin.

Lomentaceæ (lō-men-tā'sē-ē), n. pl. [From lomentum (see above).] A sub-order of Crucifere, the siliqua of which resembles a lomentum in having each seed divided from its neighbour by a transverse dissepiment. The common British plants jointed-charlock (Raphanus Raphanistrum) and purple sea-rocket (Cakile maritima) belong to this sub-order.

group of wading birds (Grallatores), characterized by the possession of long, slender, soft bills, grooved for the perforations of the nostrils. The legs are sometimes rather short, sometimes of great length; the toes are of moderate length, and the hallux is usually short and sometimes absent. The bill in these birds serves as an organ of touch, being used as a kind of probe to feel for food in mud or marshy soil. To fulfil this purpose the tip of the bill is furnished with numerous filaments of the fifth nerve. They feed mostly upon insects and worms, and are not strictly aquatic in their habits, mostly frequenting marshy districts, moors, fens, the banks of rivers or lakes, or the shores of the sea. This group comprises the snipes, sandpipers, curlews, ruffs, godwits, turnstones, avocets, &c.

Longish (long'ish), a. Somewhat long; moderately long.

Longitude (lon'ji-tüd), n. [L. longitudo, from longus, long.] 1. Length; measure along the longest line.

The ancients did determine the longitude of all rooms which were longer than broad by the double of their latitude. Watson.

2. In geog. distance on the surface of the globe measured on an arc of the equator or a parallel of latitude; or, as more commonly defined, the arc or portion of the equator intercepted between the meridian of a place and some meridian selected as a starting-point in calculating longitude, and called the first meridian; otherwise, the angle between the meridian plane of one place and the meridian plane of another. In this country longitudes are reckoned from the meridian of the royal observatory at Greenwich, which is that most commonly adopted in the construction of maps, though the meridians of Paris, Ferro, and Washington are also employed. Longitude is either expressed in degrees, minutes, and seconds, or in time, for since any point of the earth's surface passes through 360° of longitude in twenty-four hours, 15° are equivalent to one hour. It is reckoned to 180° eastward or westward; thus Vienna is in lon. 16° 23' E. When the latitude and longitude of a place are known, its precise situation on the globe is known, and hence it is of great importance to mariners to be able to determine their latitude and longitude at any time. There are various ways of finding longitude at sea. One of the most common is by means of a chronometer which gives the Greenwich time at any place, while the local time at that place is found by observation of the sun, the difference giving the longitude in time. See LATITUDE.—3. In astron. the distance in degrees, reckoned from the vernal equinox, on the ecliptic, to a circle at right angles to it passing through the heavenly body whose longitude is designated.—Geocentric longitude, in astron. the longitude of a heavenly body as reckoned on or referred to a circle, of which the centre is the same as that of the earth.—Helio-centric longitude, the longitude of a heavenly body as reckoned on or referred to a circle, of which the centre coincides with the sun's centre.

Lophiidae (lös-fi-dē), n. pl. A family of teleostean fishes of the order Acanthopterygii, distinguished by the bones of the carpus being elongated, and forming a kind of arm, which supports the pectoral fins. The angler or fishing-frog belongs to this family. See LOPHIUS.

Lophiodon (lös-fi-o-don), n. [Gr. lophos, a crest or eminence, and odon, a tooth.] A genus of fossil mammals allied to the tapir and rhinoceros; so named from certain points or eminences on the teeth. They are found in tertiary formations.

Lophiodont (lös-fi-o-dont), a. Relating or pertaining to the lophiodon.

Lophius (lös'fi-us), n. [Gr. lophos, a crest or eminence.] A genus of acanthoptery-

Fishing-frog (Lophius piscatorius).

gious fishes, belonging to the family Lophiidae. The head is very wide, depressed, with protuberances, and bearing long separate movable tendrils; mouth capacious and armed with formidable teeth; skin soft, without scales; fins fleshy and supported on a firm framework of bones, so that to some extent they are capable of serving as feet. In general appearance these fishes have been compared to a gigantic tadpole. They lie at the bottom concealed in mud, and by gently waving the filamentous appendages on the head attract the smaller fishes, upon which they prey. The best known species is L. piscatorius (the angler, fishing-frog, toad-fish, sea-devil, &c.), often found on the British coasts. Its voracity is extreme; one 2½ feet long has been caught with a cod 2 feet long in its stomach.

Lophobranchiate (lō-fō-brang'ki-āt), a. Appellative of an order of osseous fishes comprehending those whose gills are disposed in tufts along the branchial arches, as in the pipe-fish and hippocampus.

Lophobranchii (lō-fō-brang'ki-i), n. pl. [Gr. lophos, a crest or tuft, and branchia, gills.] A family of fishes in which the gills, instead of being pectinated, are separated into small rounded tufts, which are arranged in Lophobranchii.

1, Pipe-fish (Syngnathus acus). 2, Head, with the operculum removed to show the tufted branchiae, a.

pairs along the branchial arches, and covered by a large operculum, so fixed as to leave only a single small orifice for the passage of the water outwards. The body is covered with small plates for scales. It comprehends the pipe-fishes.

Lophopea (lō-fop'ē-a), n. See LOPHOPODA.

Lophophore (lō-fō-fōr), n. [Gr. lophos, a crest, and phero, to carry.] In zool. the disc or stage upon which the tentacles of the Polyzoa are borne.

Lophophorina (lō-fō-fō-rī'nē), n. pl. [Gr. lophos, a crest, and phero, to bear.] The monauls, a sub-family of gallinaceous birds of the pheasant family (Phasianidae).

Lophopoda (lō-fop'o-da), n. pl. [Gr. lophos, a crest, and podos, a foot.] The freshwater Polyzoa, in which the tentacles, instead of being placed in a circle round the mouth, are supported upon a pair of long arms, which usually form a sort of horse-shoe. Their tentacles are usually more numerous than in the marine forms. An example of this structure is seen in the Plumatella.

Lophyropoda (lō-fi-ro-p'o-da), n. pl. [Gr. lophourous, having a bushy tail or tufts, and podos, a foot.] One of the five sections of entomostrophic crustaceans, comprehending those forms, as Cyclops, which have a masticating mouth and numerous leaflike bristles attached to the feet.

Lophyrus (lō-fi-rus), n. [Gr. lophourous. See above.] 1. A genus of hymenopterous insects, belonging to the family Tenthredinidae or saw-flies. The larva of the British species (L. pinii) feeds on the fir.—2. A sub-genus of the gasteropodous genus of molluscs Chiton. 3. A genus of Javan tree-lizards.—4. A genus of the family Columbidae.

Loppard (lop'ard), n. A tree with the top lopped or cut off; a pollard.

Lopper (lop'er), n. One that lops.

Lopper (lop'er), v. t. [Sc. lapper; allied to D. lobberig, gelatinous. Prov. G. lübern, G. liefen, geleferen, to curdle or coagulate; G. luppe, lab, rennet; Icel. hleypa, to curdle, to cause to run, from hlauþa, to leap or run = E. leap; while heslop, loop (a mass of melted ore), perhaps slab (adj.), are kindred words. Comp. run in Scotch sense of curdle.] To curdle or coagulate, as milk which has become sour.

Lopping (lop'ing), n. 1. The cutting off of all the branches of a tree, except the crop or leading shoot, for the sake of the profit to be derived from them; as contrasted with pruning, by which some of the branches are cut off for the sake of the tree.—2. That which is cut off; severed branches.

Loppy (lop'i), a. [From Prov. E. lop, to hang loosely. See next art.] Hanging down; limp and pendulous. 'A smeared and loppy shirt collar.' Shirley Brooks. [Rare.]

Lop-sided (lop'sid-ed), a. [Written also lap-sided, lob-sided, from O. and Prov. E. lob, lop, to hang down or droop, Icel. labba, to slouch; allied to G. lappen, to hang loose, E. lap (which see).] Heavier at one side than the other; lying or inclining to one side. 'A lop-sided, shambling vagabond.' Theodore Hook.

Loquacious (lō-kwā'shus), a. [L. loquax, loquacis, from loquor, Skr. lap, to speak, to talk. Colloquy, eloquent, obloquy, &c., are from this stem.] 1. Talkative; given to continual talking. 'Loquacious, brawling, ever in the wrong.' Dryden.—2. Speaking; noisy.

Blind British bards, with volent touch, Traverse loquacious strings. J. Philips.

3. Apt to blab and disclose secrets.—Talkative, Loquacious, Garrulous. See under TALKATIVE.

Loquaciously (lō-kwā'shus-i), adv. In a loquacious or talkative manner.

Loquaciousness (lō-kwā'shus-nes), n. The state or quality of being loquacious; loquacity.

Loquacity (lō-kwā's-i-ti), n. [L. loquacitas, from loquax. See LOQUACIOUS.] Talkativeness; the habit or practice of talking continually or excessively.

Too great loquacity and too great taciturnity by fits. Arbuthnot.

SYN. Talkativeness, loquaciousness, garrulity, chatter, volubility.

Loquat (lō'kwat), a. A Chinese and Japanese evergreen tree of the genus Eriobotrya (E. japonensis), nat. order Rosaceae, closely allied to the genus Mespilus (medlars). Its fruit, which bears the same name, is held in high esteem, and is about the size of a large gooseberry. The tree has been introduced into Australia, and is not unfrequent in hot-houses in England. It grows to the height of 20 to 30 feet, but in cultivation is seldom permitted to exceed 12 feet.

Loquela (lō-kwē'la), n. [L.] In law, an impanance; a declaration.

Loranthaceæ (lō-ran-thā'sē-ē), n. pl. [See LORANTHUS.] A nat. order of exogenous plants, chiefly inhabiting the tropics, now considered as allied to Santalaceæ. They have mostly hermaphrodite flowers, the perianth being often brilliantly coloured, all in one piece, or formed of many sepals. The stamens are inserted on the perianth-segments; the ovary is one-celled, with a solitary erect ovule. The Loranthaceæ are true parasites, growing upon the branches of trees. They have opposite leathery leaves, or are leafless. There is but one species found wild in England, the common mistletoe (Viscum album). A species of Loranthus occurs in the south of Europe. The bark is usually astringent, and the berries contain a viscid matter like birdlime.

Loranthus (lō-ran'thus), n. [From Gr. lōron, a thong, and anthos, a flower—in allusion to the long linear form of the petals.] A large genus of plants, the type of the nat. order Loranthaceæ. The species are evergreen shrubs, parasitical on trees. L. europæus has the habit of the common mistletoe: it is a native of the southern parts of Europe, and is found on the oak. Many of the tropical species have gorgeous scarlet blossoms.

Lorate (lō'rāt), a. [L. lorum, a thong, a strap.] In bot. shaped like a thong or strap.

Lorcha (lor'cha), n. A light Chinese sailing vessel, carrying guns, built after the European model, but rigged like a Chinese junk.

Lord (lord), n. [O.E. laverd, loverd, &c., A Sax. hlāford, lāford, a lord, from hlāf, hlāf, bread, loaf, and probably weard, E. ward, that is bread-ward. Another suggested derivation is hlāf, and ord, origin, beginning, point; but it seems hardly possible that such a compound could have given rise to a personal designation. Lady is also a disguised compound with loaf as first element. See LADY.] 1. A master; a person possessing supreme power and authority; a ruler; a governor; a monarch.

But now I was the lord
Of this fair mansion. Shak.
Man over man
He made not lord. Milton.

2. The Supreme Being; Jehovah: with the definite article except in address; also applied to Christ, especially in the expression our Lord. When Lord in the Old Testament is printed in capitals it is the translation of JEHOVAH, and so might with more propriety be rendered.—Lord's Supper, in the Christian Church, the sacrament of the eucharist, so named because it was instituted by our Saviour when he took his last meal with his disciples, on the occasion of celebrating the Passover.—3. A title of respect formerly given to persons of superior rank or consideration, especially in the phrase of address 'my lord,' as to kings and princes, monks or other ecclesiastics, a husband, or the like.

My lord the monk, quod he, be mery of chere. Chaucer.

Art thou that my lord Elijah? 1 Kl. xviii. 7.
I oft in bitterness of soul deplored
My absent daughter, and my dearer lord. Pope.

4. The proprietor of a manor.—5. A nobleman; a title of honour in Great Britain given to those who are noble by birth or creation; a term applied to peers of the realm, including dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts, and barons. Archbishops and bishops also, as members of the House of Lords, are lords of parliament. (See Lords Temporal, Lords Spiritual, below.) By courtesy also the title is given to the sons of dukes and marquises, and to the eldest sons of earls.—6. An honorary title bestowed on certain official personages, generally as part of a designation. The mayors of London, Dublin, &c., the provosts of Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c., receive this title; also, various judges while presiding in court; and those of the highest courts in Scotland have personal titles as lords.—Lord-lieutenant. LOTO (lô'tô), n. [Hind.] A polished brass pot, used for cooking, drinking, and drawing water.

Each man carries his bamboo lathee shod with iron, with a bundle at one end, and the unfailing loto . . . at the other. W. H. Russell.

LOTOPHAGI (lô-tô'fâ-jî), n. pl. [Gr. lotus, eaters.] In ancient Greek legends, the name of a people who lived on the fruit of the lotus-tree. They received Ulysses and his followers hospitably, but the sweetness of the fruit induced such a feeling of happy languor that they forgot their native land and ceased to desire to return to it, their sole object being to live in delicious dreamy idleness in Lotus-land.

LOTOS (lô'tôs), Same as Lotus (which see).

LOTTERY (lôt'ter-i), n. [Fr. loterie. See LOT.]

1. Allotment or distribution of anything by fate or chance; a procedure or scheme for the distribution of prizes by lot; the drawing of lots. In general, lotteries consist of a certain number of tickets drawn at the same time, some of which entitle the holders to prizes, while the rest are blanks. This species of gaming has been resorted to at different periods by most of the European governments as a means of raising money for public purposes. Both state and private lotteries were rendered illegal in this country in 1826, except in the case of art-unions, where the distribution by lottery of works of art was legalized.

So let high-sided tyranny rage on,
Till each man drop by lottery. Shak.

2. † The lot or portion falling to one's share.

A blessed lottery to him. Shak.

LOTUS (lô'tus), n. [Gr. lôtos.] 1. A name vaguely applied to a number of different plants famous in mythology and tradition. One of these is the Zizyphus Lotus, a native of Northern Africa and Southern Europe, belonging to the nat. order Rhamnaceæ. It is a shrub of 2 or 3 feet high, bearing a fruit, the jujube, which is a drupe of the size of a wild plum. Some think this was the food of the Lotophagi of Homer, though others consider Homer's lotus to have been the date, or the berry of the Rhamnus Lotus, a North African shrub, while others again refer it to the agreeable berry of the Nitraria tridentata, still greatly prized by the Berbers. The name lotus was also given to several species of water-lily, as the blue water-lily (Nymphaea cœrulea), the Egyptian water-lily (N. Lotus), and to the nelumbo (Nelumbium speciosum), which grow in stagnant or slowly running waters. Nymphaea cœrulea and N. Lotus are often found figured on Egyptian buildings, columns, &c., and the nelumbo, or Hindu and Chinese lotus, bears a prominent part in the mythology of these countries.—

Fâte, fâr, fat, fâl; mē, met, hér; pine, pin; nôte, not, möve; tûbe, tub, byll;

oil, pound; ù, Sc. abune; ý, Sc. fey.

2. A genus of plants, nat. order Leguminosæ, consisting of creeping herbs and undershrubs, chiefly natives of temperate regions throughout the world. They have yellow, red, or white flowers, growing in umbels on axillary peduncles, and compound leaves of four or five leaflets. Four or five species are found in Britain, where they are known as bird's-foot trefoil. They resemble the clovers in their general properties.—3. In arch. an ornament in the form of the Egyptian water-lily (Nymphaea lotus) frequently figured in the architecture of ancient nations, especially on the capitals of Egyptian columns.

Lotus-eater, Lotos-eater (lō'tus-ēt-ēr, lō'tos-ēt-ēr), n. One of the Lotophagi. 'The mild-eyed melancholy lotos-eaters.' Tennyson. See LOTOPHAGI.

tuous elegance. The palace of Versailles and the east front of the Louvre are prominent examples of the style. The most characteristic features of the Louis-Quatorze style, however, are seen in the internal ornamental decoration, the great medium of which was gilt stucco-work, and its most striking characteristics are an infinite play of light and shade, and a certain disregard of symmetry of parts and of symmetrical arrangement. The characteristic details are the scroll and shell. The classical ornaments, and all the elements of the Cinque-cento, from which the Louis-Quatorze proceeded, are admitted under peculiar treatment, or as accessories; the panels are formed by chains of scrolls, the concave and convex alternately; some clothed with an acanthus foliation, others plain.—Louis-Quinze (lō-s-kanz) is the name for the variety of this style of ornament which prevailed in France during the reign of Louis XV. In it the want of symmetry in the details, and of symmetrical arrangement, which characterize the Louis XIV. style, are carried to an extreme. An utter disregard of symmetry, a want of attention to masses, and an elongated treatment of the foliations of the scroll, together with a species of crimped conventional shell-work, are characteristics of this style.

G. lūs, G. laus, derived by some from root of lose, by others from a root meaning to creep, seen in Slav. lizu, to creep; W. llaw, creepers, lice. The plural is formed by unlaut, as in mousse, mice; foot, feet; man, men, an original i in the termination having modified the stem-vowel.] The common name of a genus (Pediculus) of apterous insects, parasitic on man and other animals. The common louse is furnished with a simple eye or ocellus, on each side of a distinctly differentiated head, the under surface of which bears a suctorial mouth. There is little distinction between the thorax and abdomen, but the segments of the former carry three pairs of legs. The legs are short, with short claws or with two opposing hooks, affording a very firm hold. The body is flattened and nearly transparent, composed of eleven or twelve distinct segments, and showing the stigmata very plainly. The young pass through no metamorphosis, and their multiplication is extremely rapid. Most, if not all, mammals are infested by lice, each having generally its own peculiar species, and sometimes having two or three. Three species are said to belong to man, viz. P. humanus (body-louse), P. capitis (head-louse), and P. pubis (crab-louse), the last perhaps constituting a distinct genus, Phthirus. They are oviparous, and their eggs, which are glued each to a hair, are popularly termed nits.

Love-lorn (lûv'lorn), a. [Love and lorn.] Forsaken by one's love; forlorn, pining, or suffering from love.

The love-lorn nightingale
Nightly to thee her sad song mourneth well. Milton.

Lovely (lûv'li), a. [A. Sax. luflic.] 1. Fitted to attract or excite love; possessing qualities that may invite affection; lovable; amiable; attractive. [Obsolete or obsolescent.]

Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant in their lives. 2 Sam. i. 23.

O! he's a lovely gentleman! Shak.

2. Exciting admiration through beauty; beautiful. 'So lovely seem'd that landscape.' Milton. 'Indeed these fields are lovely.' Tennyson.

Alive, the crooked hand of death had marr'd
Those lovely features which cold death hath spar'd. Walter.

I must instance a more unfortunate case. The epithet lovely can fitly be used only of beings capable of exciting, by their moral and physical perfec-tions, the passion of love, and at the same time of reciprocating it. That only is lovely which is both lovable and loving. In the affection and exaggeration which so often characterizes the phraseology of polite society, this unhappy word was seized upon and generalized in its application, and it soon became the one epithet of commendation in young ladies' seminaries and similar circles, where it was and is applied indiscriminately to all pleasing material objects, from a piece of plumcake to a Gothic cathedral. Ruskin unluckily adopted this school-girl triviality, and by the popularity of his writings, has made it almost universal. G. P. Marsh.

[There is no doubt that lovely, like other words, is often misapplied, but Mr. Marsh in the above extract would limit its meaning too much; it was certainly applied to inanimate objects long before Mr. Ruskin's day, as the extracts show.]—3. † Loving; tender. 'Seal the title with a lovely kiss.' Shak.

Lovely (lūv'ly), adv. So as to induce or excite love; very beautifully or pleasantly. 'Lovely fair.' Shak. 'Earth . . . lovely smiled.' Milton.

Love-making (lūv'māk-ing), n. Courtship; paying one's addresses to a lady.

The inquiry of truth, which is the love-making or wooing of it; the knowledge of truth, the preference of it; and the belief of truth, the enjoying of it,—is the sovereign good of human nature. Bacon.

Love-match (lūv'mach), n. A marriage entered into for love alone.

Lovemonger (lūv'mung-gēr), n. One who deals in affairs of love.

Thou art an old lovemonger, and speakest skilfully. Shak.

Love-pined (lūv'pind), a. Wasted by love.

Lover (lūv'ēr), n. 1. One who loves or is attached or kindly disposed to another. 'How dear a lover of my lord your husband.' Shak. 2. One who is enamoured; a person in love: now used in the singular almost exclusively of the man, though formerly also of the woman, while the plural is still commonly used of an amorous couple.

Your brother and his lover have embraced. Shak.

3. One who likes or is pleased with anything; as, a lover of books or of science; a lover of wine; a lover of religion.

Lovingness (lūv'ing-nes), n. Affection; kind regard.

The only two bands of good-will, loveliness and lovingness. Sir P. Sidney.

Low (lō), a. [O.E. law, lawe, lagh, &c.; not in A. Sax.; D. laag, Icel. lág, Dan. lav; akin perhaps to lie, and perhaps to law. For the softening of g to w comp. law, saw, dawn, &c.] 1. Depressed below any given or imagined surface or place. Low is opposed to high, and both are relative terms. That which is low with respect to one thing may be high with respect to another. A low house would be a high fence; a low flight for an eagle would be a high flight for a partridge; the sun is low when it is not far above the horizon.—2. Not rising to the usual height; as, a man of low stature; a low tide, that is, a tide which, when full, does not rise to the usual height: different from low tide (see def. 4).—3. Deep; descending far below the adjacent ground; as, a low valley.

The lowest bottom shook of Erebus. Milton.

4. At or near the furthest point to which the sea recedes by the fall of the tide; as, low water; low tide. [When intended to be used with precision these phrases always signify the very lowest point of the tide.]—5. Below the usual rate or amount, or below the ordinary value; below the probable amount; moderate; as, a low price of corn; low wages; a low estimate.—6. Not loud; as, a low voice.—7. Grave; depressed in the scale of sounds; as, a low note.—8. As applied to numbers, not expressing many units; indicative of a small number. Hence.—9. Near or not very distant from the equator; as, a low latitude, such latitudes being expressed by low numbers.—10. Dejected; depressed in vigour; wanting strength or animation; as, low spirits; low in spirits; to be a cup too low, that is, not to have drunk enough to be in good spirits.—11. Depressed in condition; in a state of humiliation and subjection.

Why but to keep ye low and ignorant? Milton.

12. Humble in rank; in a mean condition; as, men of high and low condition; the lower walks of life; a low class of people.—13. Mean; abject; vulgar; grovelling; base; dishonourable; as, a person of low mind; a low trick or stratagem.—14. Not elevated or sublime; not exalted in thought or diction; as, a low comparison; a low metaphor; low language.

In comparison of these divine writers, the noblest wits of the heathen world are low and dull. Felton.

15. Submissive.

And pay thee fealty
With low subjection. Milton.

16. Feeble; weak; having little vital energy; as, a low pulse; he is in a low state of health. 17. Moderate; not excessive or intense; not violent; as, a low heat; a low temperature; a low fever.—18. Plain; simple; not rich, high-seasoned, or nourishing; as, a low diet. 19. Inclined to the Low Church.—Low Church. See High Church under HIGH, a.

—Low Countries, the Netherlands.—Low Dutch or Low German. See DUTCH and LOW-GERMAN.—Low Latin, the Latin of the middle ages.—Low steam, steam having a low pressure or expansive force. See LOW-PRESSURE, a.—Low Sunday, the Sunday next after Easter: so called because it was the practice of the early Christians to repeat some part of the Easter-day services on the octave of Easter. The day was a feast-day, but the contrast between the lesser rites of this day and the higher solemnities of Easter conferred on it this name.—Low water, the lowest point of the ebb or receding tide.—Low wine, a liquor produced by the first distillation of alcohol; the first run of the still.—Lower chalk, in geol. the name given to a member of the chalk formation, distinguished by the absence of flints, and by the superior hardness of the chalk, which is sometimes used for building-stone.—Lower Empire, a name sometimes given to the Roman Empire from the time of the removal of the seat of empire to Constantinople.—Lower greensand, the lowest member of the chalk series. Called also Shanklin-sand and Iron-sand.

Low (lō), adv. 1. Not aloft; not on high; near the ground; as, the bird flies very low. 2. Under the usual price; at a moderate price; as, he sold his wheat low.—3. In a mean condition: in composition; as, a low-born fellow; a low-born lass.—4. Late, or in time approaching our own.

In astron. in a path near the equator, or so that the declination is small: said of the heavenly bodies with reference to the diurnal revolution; as, the moon runs low, that is, is comparatively near the horizon when on or near the meridian.

Low† (lō), v. t. To sink; to depress. Swift.

Low (lō), v. i. [A. Sax. hlōwan, D. loetjen, Icel. hlóa, O.H.G. hlojan, to low.] To below, as an ox or cow.

The lowing herd winds slowly o'er the lea. Gray.

Low (lō), n. The sound uttered by a bovine animal, as a bull, ox, cow; a moo. 'Talking voices and the low of herds.' Wordsworth.

Bull Jove, sir, had an amiable low. Shak.

Low (lou), n. [Icel. log, logi, a flame, loga, to blaze; Dan. lue, G. lohe, a flame. Allied to A. Sax. lig, lige, a flame. For softening of g to v, see LOW, a.] Flame; fire. [Scotch or northern English.]

There sat a bottle in a bole
Beyond the ingle low. Burns.

Low (lou), v. i. To flame; to blaze. [Old English and Scotch.]

A vast, unbottomed, boundless pit,
Fill'd fou o' lowin' brunstane. Burns.

Lowbell (lō'bel), n. [Low, a flame, and bell.] 1. A bell used in a certain kind of fowling by night, the birds being made to lie close by the sound of the bell and blinded by a light, so as to be easily taken by a net which is thrown over them.—2. A bell to be hung on the necks of sheep or other animals. This is the bell probably alluded to in Beaumont and Fletcher's 'Peace, gentle lowbell,' which probably means 'Peace, gentle sheep.' Lowbell (lō'bel), v. t. To scare, as with a lowbell.

Low-born (lō'born), a. Of mean or low birth.

Low-caste (lō'kast), a. Of a low race or caste; as, a low-caste Hindu. See CASTE.

Low-churchism (lō'chérch-izm), n. Low-church principles. See High Church under HIGH.

Low-churchman (lō'chérch-man), n. One who maintains Low-church principles. See High Church under HIGH.

To cause to descend; to let down; to take or bring down; as, to lower the mainsail of a sloop.—2. To reduce or humble; to make less high or haughty; as, to lower the pride of man.—3. To lessen; to diminish; to reduce, as value or amount; as, to lower the price or value of goods, or the rate of interest.—Lower cheery! (naut.) the order to lower expeditiously.—Lower handsomely! (naut.) the order to lower gradually.—To lower spirits, among distillers, to reduce the strength of spirits by mixing with water.—SYN. To depress, sink, reduce, lessen, diminish, decrease, humble, humiliate, abase.

Lower (lō'ēr), v. i. To fall; to sink; to grow less.

Lower (lō'ēr), v. i. [Same word as Loeren, to frown; L.G. luren, to look sullen; comp. also G. lauern, to lurk; E. leery; perhaps also glover.] 1. To appear dark or gloomy; to be clouded; to threaten a storm. 'And all the clouds that lowered upon our house.' Shak. 'The lowering spring.' Dryden.—2. To frown; to look sullen.

But sullen discontent sat lowering on her face. Dryden.

Lower† (lō'ēr), n. 1. Cloudiness; gloominess.—2. A frowning; sullenness. Sidney.

Lower-case (lō'ēr-kās), n. In printing, (a) the case of boxes that contains the small letters of printing-type. Hence, (b) small letters of printing-type.

Lower-case (lō'ēr-kās), a. In printing, applied to small letters, in distinction from capitals. See the noun.

Lower-class (lō'ēr-klas), a. Pertaining or having relation to persons of the poorer and humbler rank of society.

My firm belief likewise was, that I now speak of will prove to be a middle-class rather than a lower-class enfranchisement. Gladstone.

Lowered (lō'ērd), p. and a. Brought down; reduced; lessened. In her. applied to ordinaries abated from their common situation.

Lowering (lou'ér-ing), p. and a. Threatening a storm; cloudy; overcast; as, a lowering sky.

Loweringly (lou'ér-ing-ly), adv. In a lowering manner; with cloudiness or threatening gloom.

Lowmest (lô'ér-môst), a. [Irregular superl. of low.] Lowest.

Lowery (lou'ér-i), a. Cloudy; gloomy.

Low-German (lô-jér'man), n. The language spoken by the dwellers in the northern and flatter parts of Germany, and in many respects nearer to Dutch or Frisian than to High German.

Low-German (lô-jér'man), a. Of or pertaining to the language known as Low-German; also in philol. applied to that class of tongues of which Low-German is a member, and which includes in addition Dutch, Flemish, Frisian, Old Saxon, Anglo-Saxon, and English. The ancient Gothic or Meso-Gothic is also generally classed with the Low-German tongues.

Lowing (lô'ing), n. The bellowing or cry of cattle.

Lowlander (lô'land-ér), n. An inhabitant of the Lowlands, especially of Scotland: opposed to Highlander.

Low-life (lô'lif), n. Mean or vulgar state, condition, or social position; persons of a mean or vulgar state, condition, or social position; as, all the characters are taken from low-life.

Lowliness (lô'li-hud, lô'li-hed), n. A humble state; meekness; humility. [Antiquated or poetical.]

The stately flower of female fortitude.
Of perfect witchhood, and pure lowliness. Tennyson.

Lowly (lô'li), adv. In a lowly manner; humbly.

Lowliness (lô'li-nes), n. The state of being lowly: (a) freedom from pride; humility; humbleness of mind.

Walk . . . with all lowliness and meekness. Eph. iv. 2.

(b) Want of dignity; abject state; meanness. [Rare.]

Low-lived (lô'livd), a. Leading a mean life.

Lowly (lô'li), a. 1. Not high; not elevated in place. 'The lowly lands.' Dryden.—2. Mean; low; wanting dignity or rank.

For from the natal hour distinctive names,
One common right the great and lowly claims. Pope.

3. Not lofty or sublime; humble.

These rural poems and their lowly strain. Dryden.

4. Having a low esteem of one's own worth; humble; meek; free from pride.

Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart. Mat. xi. 29.

(i) Depression in price or worth; as, the lowness of price or value; the lowness of the funds or of the markets. (j) Graveness of sound; as, the lowness of notes. (k) Softness of sound; mildness or gentleness of utterance; as, the lowness of the voice.

Low-pressure (lô'pre-shûr), a. Having a low degree of expansive force, and consequently exerting a low degree of pressure: often applied to steam, but not with very much precision.—Low-pressure engine, an engine in which steam of a low pressure is employed, or in which the pressure on the piston is never much more than two atmospheres. Formerly low-pressure engines were all condensing, and this latter property formed the distinction between high-pressure and low-pressure engines, but many high-pressure engines are now condensing.

Until a short time ago all condensing engines were low-pressure, now the most efficient engines constructed are certain marine engines (designed for vessels which make long voyages), which are high-pressure and condensing. Pop. Ency.

Low-spirited (lô'spir-it-ed), a. Not having animation and courage; dejected; depressed; not lively or sprightly.

Low-spiritedness (lô'spir-it-ed-nes), n. Dejection of mind or courage; a state of low spirits.

Low-studded (lô'stud-ed), a. Furnished or built with short studs; as, a low-studded house or room. Goodrich.

Lowt. See LOUT.

Low-water (lô'wa-tér), a. Relating to the lowest point of the ebb or receding tide; as, the low-water mark. See WATER-MARK.

Low-worm (lô'wérn), n. In farriery, a disease in horses like the shingles.

Loxa-bark (lôks'a-bârk), n. A kind of Peruvian or cinchona bark, the produce of Cinchona Condaminæ.

Loxarthrus (lôks'âr-thrus), n. [Gr. loxos, twisted, and arthron, a joint.] In med. an obliquity of a joint without dislocation or spasm, as in the case of club-foot.

Loxia (lôks'i-a), n. [Gr. loxos, twisted.] 1. In med. a distortion of the head toward one side; wry-neck.—2. A genus of conirostral insectorial birds, characterized by having a compressed beak, and the two mandibles so much curved that their points cross each other. The cross-bill (Loxia curvirostra) is the type of this genus.

Loxiadæ, Loxiide (lôks'i-a-dæ, lôks'î-dæ), n. pl. The cross-bills, a family of conirostral birds, of which the genus Loxia is the type.

Loxodon, Loxodonta (lôks'o-don, lôks-o-don'ta), n. [Gr. loxos, oblique, and odontos, a tooth.] A sub-genus of elephants, living and fossil, so called from the rhomb-shaped discs of the worm molars.

Loxodromic (lôks-o-drom'ik), a. [Gr. loxos, oblique, and dromos, a course.] Pertaining to oblique sailing, or sailing by the rhumb; as, loxodromic tables.—Loxodromic curve, or line, or spiral, the path of a ship when her course is directed constantly towards the same point of the compass, in a direction oblique to the equator, so as to cut all the meridians at equal angles. It is a kind of logarithmic spiral, having properties analogous to those of the common logarithmic spiral. It always approaches the pole, but never reaches it; so that a ship, by following always the same oblique course, would continually approach nearer and nearer to the pole of the earth without ever arriving at it. See RHUMB.

Loxodromics (lôks-o-drom'iks), n. The art of oblique sailing by the loxodromic or rhumb, which always makes an equal angle with every meridian.

Loxodromism (lôks-o-drom'izm), n. The tracing of a loxodromic curve or line; the act of moving as if in a loxodromic curve.

Loxodromy (lôks-o-drom'i), n. Loxodromics.

Loxomma (lôks-om'ma), n. [Gr. loxos, oblique, and omma, the eye.] A genus of fossil labyrinthodont amphibians, distinguished from the other genera of labyrinthodonts by the very oblique disposition of the long axes of the eye-orbits.

Loxonema (lôks-o-né'ma), n. [Gr. loxos, oblique, and néma, a thread.] A genus of paleozoic fossil gasteropods, with pyramidal shells, so named from the stria by which the surface of many of the species are marked.

Loxosoma (lôks-o-sô'ma), n. [Gr. loxos, oblique, and sôma, body.] A marine polyzoon-like animal, a connecting form between the worms, the Polyzoa, and the Brachiopoda.

Loy (loi), n. In agri. a long narrow spade used in stony lands. Farmer's Ency.

Loyal (loi'al), a. [Fr. loyal, O. Fr. loial, leial, leal, from L. legalis, pertaining to law, from lex, legis, a law. Leal is another form.]

True or faithful in allegiance; devoted to the maintenance of law and order; faithful to the lawful government; faithful to a prince or superior; true to plighted faith, duty, or love; not treacherous; constant; as, a loyal subject; a loyal wife.

There Laodamia with Evadne moves,
Unhappy both! but loyal in their loves. Dryden.

There sat the lifelong creature of the house,
Loyal, the dumb old servant, on deck,
Winking his eyes, and twisted all his face. Tennyson.

Loyalism (loi'al-izm), n. Loyalty.

Loyalist (loi'al-ist), n. A person who adheres to his sovereign or to constituted authority; particularly, one who maintains his allegiance to his prince, and defends his cause in times of revolt or revolution.

Loyally (loi'al-ly), adv. In a loyal manner; faithfully.

Loyallness (loi'al-nes), n. Loyalty. [Rare.]

Loyalty (loi'al-ti), n. The state or quality of being loyal; faithfulness to a prince or superior, or to duty, love, &c.; constancy.

He had . . . such loyalty to the king as the law required. Clarendon.

Lozel (lôz'el), n. Same as Losel.

Lozenge (loz'enj), n. [Fr. losange, probably the same as loange (O. Fr. losange, loange, loange, L. L. laudemia, L. laus, praise; see LOSENGOUT), praise; inscriptions or devices on heraldic shields, monumental slabs, &c., may have been called lozenges or lozanges, from their tending to the exaltation of the personages they belonged to, and hence the term may have come to signify the objects themselves. Wedgwood suggests Sp. losa, Lang. lauzo, a slate or flat stone for paving.] 1. In geom. a figure with four equal sides, having two acute and two obtuse angles, called popularly a Diamond; a rhomb.—2. Something resembling such a figure in form: as, (a) in her. a bearing of such a shape, appropriate to the arms of spinsters and widows. (b) A small cake of sugar, &c., often medicated, originally in the form of a rhomb, but now variously shaped. (c) A small rhomb-shaped pane of glass, set in a leaden frame for a church window or house-lattice.—Lozenge moulding.

ing, a kind of moulding used in Norman architecture, of many different forms, all of which are characterized by lozenge-shaped compartments or ornaments.

Lozenged (loz'enjd), a. Made into the shape of lozenges.

Lozenge-shaped (loz'enj-shäpt), a. Having the form of a lozenge or rhomb.

Lozeny, Lozengee (loz'en-jî, loz'en-jé), a. In her. a term used to express the field or any armorial charge which is divided by diagonal lines transversely into equal parts or lozenges of different tinctures.

Lu (lô), n. and v.t. Same as Loo.

Lubbard (lub'ard), n. A lubber. Str. W. Scott.

Lubber (lub'er), n. [Allied to looby, lob, W. lob, an unwieldy fellow, a dull fellow, Ubbi, a clumsy fellow, a lubber.] A heavy, clumsy fellow; a sturdy drone; a clown; specifically, a term applied by sailors to one who does not know seamanship.

And lingering lubbers lose many a penny. Tusser.

—Lubber's point (naut.), a black vertical line drawn on the inside of the case of the mariner's compass. This line, and the pin on which the card turns, are in the same vertical plane with the keel of the ship, and hence the rhumb opposite to the lubber's point shows the course of the ship at any time. The lubber's point, however, deviates from its proper position when the ship is heeled over, hence seamen do not implicitly depend upon it, as indeed its name implies.

—Lubber's hole (naut.), the vacant space

oil, pound; ü, Sc. abune; y, Sc. fey.

between the head of a lower-mast and the edge of the top through which sailors may mount without going over the rim by the Rigging of Ship's Top.

ff. Top. gg. Lubber's holes. hh. Futtock-shrouds.

futtock-shrouds. It is considered by sailors as only fit to be used by lubbers.

Lubberly (lūb'ér-li), a. Like a lubber; clumsy; clownish; as, a lubberly fellow or boy.

Lubberly (lūb'ér-li), adv. Clumsily; awkwardly.

Lubric, Lubrical (lū'brik, lū'brik-al), a. [L. lubricus, slippery, hazardous, deceitful.] 1. Having a smooth surface; slippery. 'Her lubric throat.' Crashaw.—2. Wavering; unsteady; uncertain. 'The deep and lubric waves of state.' Sir H. Wotton. 'Thy lubric and glibbery muse.' B. Jonson.—3. Lascivious; wanton; lewd. 'This lubric and adulterate age.' Dryden.

Lubricant (lū'brik-ant), a. [L. lubricans, lubricans, ppr. of lubrico. See LUBRICATE.] Lubricating.

Lubricant (lū'brik-ant), n. That which lubricates; specifically, a substance used to diminish the friction of the working parts of machinery, as an oily or greasy substance.

Lubricate (lū'brik-āt), v.t. pres. & pp. lubricating, ppr. lubricating. [L. lubrico, from lubricus, slippery.] To make smooth or slippery; to rub or supply with some substance, especially an oily or greasy substance, for the purpose of diminishing friction; as, mucilaginous and saponaceous medicines lubricate the parts to which they are applied; to lubricate the parts of a machine.

Lubricate (lū'brik-āt), a. Slippery. [Rare.]

Lubrication (lū'brik-ā-shon), n. The act of lubricating or state of being lubricated.

Lubricator (lū'brik-ā-ter), n. One who or that which lubricates; specifically, in mach. an oil-cup or other contrivance for supplying oil or grease to diminish the friction between rubbing surfaces.

Lubrification, Lubrication (lū'bri-fak'-shon, lū'bri-fī-kā'-shon), n. [L. lubricus, and facio, to make.] The act or operation of lubricating or of making smooth and slippery.

Lucanidae (lū-kā'nī-dē), n. pl. [The genus Lucanus, and Gr. eidos, resemblance.] The stag-beetles, a family of lamellicorn coleopterous insects, distinguished by the very large and powerful mandibles with which the males are furnished. They live during the day in the trunks of trees and old wood, and take flight at dusk. The larvae of the European species live in the willow and the oak, and remain untransformed for several years. The common stag-beetle (Lucanus cervus) is a highly characteristic species of the group (see STAG-BEETLE), and is one of the largest of British insects. This species flies about in the evening in the middle of summer, especially round the oaks, upon the wood of which the larvae feed. Some of the foreign genera of stag-beetles are remarkable for their brilliant colouring, such as Lamprina, an Australian group, and Chiasognathus, a curious genus from the isle of Chiloe.

Lucanus (lū-kā'nus), n. [L. Lucanus, sunrise, from L. luceo, to shine—in allusion to their splendid metallic colouring.] A genus of beetles, the type of the family Lucanidae.

Lucarne (lū'kār-nē), n. [Fr. lucarne, L. lucerna, a lamp, from luceo, to shine.] A dormer or garret window.

Lucayne† (lū'kān), n. In arch. same as Lucarne.

Luce (lūs), n. [L. lucius, a fish supposed to be the pike.] A pike full grown; a fish used as a heraldic bearing.

The pike is the luce of heraldry. . . . There is no earlier example borne in English heraldry than is afforded by the pikes on the arms of the family of Lucy. Moule (Heraldry of Fish).

[Shakspeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 1, seems to allude to this.]

Lucent (lū'sent), a. [L. lucens, lucens, ppr. of luceo, to shine. See LIGHT.] Shining; bright; resplendent. 'The sun's lucens orb.' Milton.

Lucern† (lū'sérn), n. [L. lucerna, from luceo, to shine.] A lamp.

Lumbrical (lum'brik-al), a. [L. lumbricus, a worm.] Pertaining to or resembling a worm; as, the lumbrical muscles of the fingers and toes.

Lumbrical (lum'brik-al), n. A muscle of the fingers and toes, so named from its resembling a worm. Of these muscles, there are four of the fingers and as many of the toes.

Lumbricidæ (lum-bris'i-dē), n. pl. The earthworm family, a family of annelids belonging to the order Oligochaeta, comprising only the genus Lumbricus. See EARTH-WORM.

Lumbriciform (lum-bris'i-form), a. [L. lumbricus, a worm, and forma, shape.] Resembling a worm in shape.

Lumbricus (lum-brī'kus), n. [L., a worm.] A genus of annelids, the type of the family Lumbricidæ, and comprising the earthworms. See EARTH-WORM.

Luminance (lū'min-ans), n. The state or quality of being luminant; luminosity; luminousness. [Rare.]

The muse of these people . . . is such a humble, home-born thing that they think of her no more than a fire-fly does of her luminance. Ouida.

Luminant (lū'min-ant), a. [See LUMINARY.]

Emitting light; shining; luminous.

Luminary (lūm'in-a-ri), n. [Fr. luminaire, from L. lumen, luminis, light, for lumen, from luceo, to shine.] 1. Any body that gives light, but chiefly one of the heavenly bodies.

Where the great luminary . . .
Dispenses light from far. Milton.

Hence—2. One who is a source of intellectual light; a person that illustrates any subject, or enlightens mankind; as, Bacon and Newton were distinguished luminaries in the spheres of philosophy and science.

Luminate (lūm'in-a-ti), v. t. [L. lūmīno, luminatum, from lumen, light.] To illuminate.

Lumination (lūm'in-ā-shon), n. Same as Illumination.

Lumine (lūm'in), v. t. To enlighten. See ILLUMINE.

Luminiferous (lūm'in-if'ēr-us), a. [L. lumen, light, and fero, to produce.] 1. Producing light; yielding light.—2. Serving as the medium for conveying light; as, the luminiferous ether.

Luminosity (lūm'in-os'i-ti), n. The quality of being luminous; luminousness.

Laplace conceives that, in its primitive state, the sun consisted in a diffused luminosity so as to resemble those nebulae among the fixed stars. W. Newell.

Luminous (lūm'in-us), a. [L. luminosus; Fr. lumineux.] 1. Shining; emitting light, whether original or reflected; as, the sun and the moon are luminous bodies.—2. Bright; brilliant; clear; as, a luminous colour.

Far in the west there lies a desert land, where the mountains Lift, through perpetual snows, their lofty and luminous summits. Longfellow.

3. Clear, as if illuminated; as, a luminous essay or argument.

Calculated to place his disinterested pursuit of truth in a luminous aspect. De Quincy.

Luminously (lūm'in-us-lī), adv. In a luminous manner; with brightness or clearness.

Luminousness (lūm'in-us-nes), n. The quality of being luminous; brightness; clearness; as, the luminousness of the sea; the luminousness of ideas, arguments, or method.

Let us consider a little each of these characters in succession; and first, what is very peculiar to this church, its luminousness. This perhaps strikes the traveller more from its contrast with the excessive gloom of the Church of St. Mark's. Ruskin.

Lummox (lum'moks), n. A fat, unwieldy, stupid person. [Provincial English and American.]

Lummy (lum'i), a. Jolly; first-rate. [Slang.]

To think of Jack Dawkins—lummy Jack—the Dodger, the artful Dodger, going abroad for a common twopenny-halfpenny snuff-box! Dickens.

Lump (lump), n. [O.D. lomp, N. lump, piece, mass; Sw. lump, a piece cut from a log; allied probably to E. tubber, lumber, lunch.] 1. A small mass of matter, of no definite shape; as, a lump of earth, a lump of butter, a lump of sugar.—2. A mass of things blended or thrown together without order or distinction; as, copper, iron, gold, silver, lead, tin, promiscuously in one lump.—3. In the lump, the whole together; in gross. 'They may buy them in the lump.' Addison.

Lump (lump), v. t. 1. To throw into a mass: to unite in a body or sum without distinction of particulars.

The expenses ought to be lumped. Aycliffe.

2. To take in the gross; to regard or speak of collectively.

Not forgetting all others, whom for brevity, but out of no resentment to you, I lump all together. Sterne.

Lump (lump), v. i. To be sulky. [Provincial English.]—If you don't like it, you may lump it, if you do not choose to take what is offered, you may sit in the sulks.

Lumper (lump'ēr), n. A labourer employed to load and unload vessels when in harbour.

Lumpfish (lump'fish), n. An acanthopterygious fish of the genus Cyclopterus (C. lumpus), and family Discoboli, so named from the clumsiness of its form. The back is arched and sharp, the belly flat, the body is covered with sharp black tubercles, and on each side there are three rows of large bony scales and another row on the back. The ventral fins are modified into a very Lump-sugar (lump'shu-gér), n. Loaf-sugar broken into small pieces.

Lumpy (lump'i), a. Full of lumps or small compact masses.

Luna (lū'na), n. [L. for lucina, from lucio, to shine.] 1. The moon.—2. In old chem. silver.—Luna cornea, fused chloride of silver, so called from its horn-like appearance.

Lunacy (lū'nā-si), n. [From L. lunaticus, lunatic, moon-struck, from luna, the moon.] A species of insanity or madness; properly, the kind of insanity which is broken by intervals of reason—formerly supposed to be influenced by the changes of the moon; madness in general; insanity, or any unsoundness of mind.—Commissioner of Lunacy. See under COMMISSION.—Commissioner in lunacy, a commissioner appointed by statute to visit and superintend asylums and grant licenses to persons who wish to open houses for the reception of patients.—SYN. Insanity, derangement, craziness, mania.

Lunar (lū'nér), a. [L. lunaris, from luna, the moon.] 1. Pertaining to the moon; as, lunar observations.—2. Measured by the revolutions of the moon; as, lunar days or years.—3. Resembling the moon; round.

In the right hand a pointed star they wield;
The left, for ward, sustains a lunar shield.

Dryden.

4. † Influenced by the moon.

They have denominated some herbs solar and some lunar, and such like toys put into great words.

Bacon.

—Lunar bone, one of the bones of the wrist.—Lunar caustic, nitrate of silver.—Lunar cycle, the period of time after which the new moons return on the same days of the year. See CYCLE.—Lunar distance (navit. astron.), a term denoting the distance of the moon from the sun, or from a fixed star or planet lying nearly in the line of its path, by means of which the longitude of a ship at sea is found.—Lunar method (navit. astron.), the method of determining the longitude of a place or ship from the observation of lunar distances.—Lunar month. See MONTH.—Lunar observation generally means an observation of the moon's distance from a star for the purpose of finding the longitude.—Lunar tables: (a) in astron. tables of the moon's motions arranged for computing the moon's true place at any time past or future. (b) In navigation, logarithmic tables for correcting the apparent distance of the moon from the sun, or from a fixed star on account of refraction and parallax.—Lunar theory, the deduction of the moon's motion from the law of gravitation.—Lunar year. See YEAR.

Lunar (lū'nér), n. In navigation, lunar distance.

Lunaria (lū'nā-ri-a), n. [From L. luna, the moon.] A genus of biennial and perennial cruciferous herbs, natives of central and southern Europe: so called from the broad silvery disseminations of the pod resembling a full moon. One of the species (L. biennis) is known by the English names of honesty or satin flower. It is a tall erect biennial, with large cordate leaves and terminal racemes of purple or white flowers.

Lunarian (lū'nā-ri-an), n. An inhabitant of the moon.

Lunary (lū'nā-ri), a. Same as Lunar. Fuller.

Lunary (lū'nā-ri), n. A plant, moonwort (which see).

Lunate, Lunated (lū'nāt, lū'nāt-ed), a. Having a form resembling that of the half-moon; crescent-shaped; as, a lunate leaf.

Lunatic (lū'nāt-ik), a. [L. lunaticus. See LUNACY.] 1. Affected by lunacy; mad; insane; as, a lunatic person. Shak.—2. Indicating or exhibiting lunacy. 'Bedlam beggars, from low farms, sometimes with lunatic bans, sometimes with prayers.' Shak.

Lunatic (lū'nāt-ik), n. A person affected by lunacy; an insane person; properly, one who has lucid intervals; a person of unsound mind; a madman.—Lunatic asylum, a house or hospital established for the reception of lunatics.

Lunation (lū'nā'shon), n. [L. lunatio, lunationis, from L. luno, lunatum, to bend like a half-moon or crescent, from luna, a moon.] The period of a synodic revolution of the moon, or the time from one new moon to the following.

Lunch (lunsh), n. [Prov. E., a lump or piece, probably a form of lump, as lunch of hump, lunch of bump, dunch (Sc.) of dump.] The use of the word to mean food taken between meals is paralleled by the common Scotch use of piece in this sense.] A luncheon (which see).

Lunch (lunsh), v. i. To take a lunch.

Luncheon (lunsh'on), n. [A longer form of lunch, perhaps for lunching; or the termination may be borrowed from nuncheon, which seems to be really a word of different origin altogether. See NUNcheon.] 1. A lump of bread; a slice.

I sliced the luncheon from the barley-loaf. Gay.

2. A slight repast or meal between breakfast and dinner—formerly between dinner and supper; food taken at any time except at a regular meal.

Luncheon (lunsh'on), v. i. To take lunch or luncheon.

While ladies are luncheoning on Perigord pie, or coursing in whirling briskas, performing all the singular ceremonies of a London morning in the heart of the season. Disraeli.

Luncheon-bar (lunsh'on-bär), n. A part of an inn or public-house where luncheon can be had.

Lune (lün), n. [L. luna, the moon.] 1. Anything in the shape of a crescent or half-moon. [Rare.]—2. In geom. a figure formed on a sphere or on a plane by two arcs of circles which inclose a space.

The lune of Hippocrates is famous as being the first curvilinear space whose area was exactly determined. Davies.

3. † A fit of lunacy or madness; a freak; a crotchet; a whim. 'Those dangerous unsafe lunies' the king.' Shak.

Lune (lün), n. [Probably another form of line.] A leash; as, the lune of a hawk.

Lunet (lū'net), n. [See LUNETTE.] A little moon; a satellite. Bp. Hall.

Lunette (lū'net'), n. [Fr. lunette, dim. of L. luna, the moon.] 1. In fort. a work in the form of a redan with flanks, used as an advanced work.—2. In farriery, a half horse-shoe, which wants the sponge, or that part of the branch which runs toward the quarters of the foot.—3. A piece of felt to cover the eye of a vicious horse.—4. In arch. an aperture for the admission of light in a concave ceiling; such are the upper lights to the naves of St. Peter's at Rome and of St. Paul's in London.—5. A kind of watch-glass, flattened in the centre; also, a kind of convex-concave lens for spectacles.—6. In archæol. a crescent-shaped penannular concave plate of metal, apparently worn as an ornament about the neck.

Lung (lung), n. [A. Sax. lunga, pl. lungen, Icel. lunga, lungu, D. long, Dan. and G. lunga. Wedgwood may be right in tracing the root-meaning to lightness or sponginess, seen in Bav. luck, lunk, light. Comp. lights.] 1. In anat. one of the two organs of respiration in air-breathing animals. They are situated one on each side of the chest, and separated from each other by the heart and larger blood-vessels. Each is inclosed in its own serous membrane, called the pleura. The general form of the lung is pyramidal, the base resting on the diaphragm, the apex extending to the base of the neck. Each lung is divided into two lobes by a deep transverse fissure near its middle, the upper lobe of the right lung being again partially divided. The left lung is narrower than the right, but is somewhat longer. Their substance is light and spongy, and being filled with air-cells floats readily on water. When the chest is expanded, the air, passing down the windpipe into the capillary ramifications of the bronchi, acts on the blood that has been vitiated by circulation, exchanging gases with it through the walls of the air-vessels. Thus purified the blood returns to the left auricle of the heart, and the air, laden with carbonic acid, is expelled by the collapse of the chest. Among birds the lungs do not hang free in the cavity of the thorax, but are attached to the ribs and backbone, the bronchi opening into the air canals of the body. In reptiles the lungs are much more simple, but differ little from the mammal type. In serpents only one lung is fully developed, the other being rudimentary. In amphibians partially, and in fishes wholly, the lungs are replaced by gills.—2. pl. (a) A person having a strong voice. (b) A servant who blew the fire of an alchemist.

That is his fire-draque,
His lungs, his zephyrus, he that puffs his coals.

B. Jonson.

Lunge (lung), n. [Contr. from allonge (which see).] A sudden thrust or pass, as with a sword. Formerly written Longe.

Lunge (lung), v. i. To make a thrust or pass, as with a sword or rapier; as, he instantly lunged at him.

Lunge (lung), v. t. In the manège, to exercise (a horse) by running round in a ring while held by a long rein. Thackeray.

Lunged (lungd), a. 1. Having lungs.—2. Drawing in and expelling air like the lungs. 'The lunged bellows.' Dryden.

Lungeous (lung'us), a. [O. Fr. longis, a lout, from long, long.] Awkward; rough; cruel; quarrelsome. [Provincial.]

Lung-grown (lung'grön), a. In med. having lungs that adhere to the pleura.

Lungie (lung'i), n. The guillemot. Sir W. Scott. [Scotch.]

Lungs, † n. [O. Fr. longis. See LOUNGE.] A lingerer; a dull, drowsy fellow. Beau. & Fl.

Lungless (lung'les), a. Having no lungs.

Lungwort (lung'wert), n. 1. A plant of the genus Pulmonaria (P. officinalis), nat. order Boraginaceae. It is a common garden flower, having red and purple tubular blossoms, and leaves speckled like human lungs, and on account of this resemblance has been used in pulmonary diseases.—2. A lichen (Stictia pulmonacea) growing abundantly on trunks of trees in moist alpine countries. It is occasionally used like Iceland-moss in diseases of the lungs.

Luni-current (lū'ni-ku-rent), a. Having relation to phases in currents, depending on the changes of the moon.

Luniform (lū'ni-form), a. [L. luna, the moon, and forma, shape.] Resembling the moon.

Lunisolar (lū-ni-sō'lār), a. [L. luna, moon, and solaris, from sol, sun.] Compounded of the revolutions of the sun and moon; resulting from the united action of the sun and moon. — Lunisolar precession, in astron. that portion of the annual precession of the equinoxes which depends on the joint action of the sun and moon. — Lunisolar period, that after which the eclipses again return in the same order. — Lunisolar year, a period of time consisting of 532 common years, found by multiplying the cycle of the sun by that of the moon.

Lunistic† (lū'nis-tis), n. [L. luna, the moon, and sto, steti, or sisto, to stand.] In astron. the farthest point of the moon's northing and southing in its monthly revolution.

Luni-tidal (lū-ni-ti-dal), a. Relating to tidal motions dependent on the moon.

Lunt (lunt), n. [D. lont, Dan. and G. lunte, a match.] 1. The match-cord used for firing cannon. — 2. A burning match; a light, as of a pipe; a flame; a column of flame and smoke; a column of smoke, as that arising from a tobacco-pipe vigorously puffed. [Scotch.]

She fufft her pipe wi' sic a lunt. Burns.

Lunt (lunt), v. i. To emit smoke; to flame; to be on fire. [Scotch.]

The luntin pipe, an' sneeshin mill,
Are handed round wi' right guid-will. Burns.

Lunula (lū'nū-lā), n. [Dim. of L. luna, the moon.] Something in the shape of a little moon or crescent; specifically, in anat. the small white semilunar mark at the base of the nails.

Lunular (lū'nū-lēr), a. [From L. lunula, dim. of luna, the moon.] Having a form like that of the new moon; shaped like a small crescent.

Lunulate, Lunulated (lū'nū-lāt, lū'nū-lāt-ed), a. [From L. lunula, dim. of luna, the moon.] Resembling a small crescent; as, a lunulate leaf.

Lunule (lū'nūl), n. [L. lunula, dim. of luna, the moon.] Something in the shape of a little moon or crescent; as, (a) a crescent-like mark or spot on some bivalve shells. (b) In geom. a lune. See LUNE.

Lunulet (lū'nū-let), n. [L. lunula, dim. of luna, the moon.] In entom. a small spot in insects shaped like a half-moon, and differing in colour from the rest of the body.

Lunulite (lū'nū-lit), n. [L. luna, the moon, and Gr. lithos, a stone.] A small fossil coral: so called from its shape.

Lupercal (lū-pēr-kal or lū-pēr-kāl), a. [From Lupercal, a grotto in the Palatine Hill sacred to Lupercus, identified by the Romans with the Lycæan Pan: so called because hewarded off the wolves, from lupus, a wolf.] Pertaining to the Lupercalia, or feasts of the Romans in honour of Lupercus or Pan.

Lupercal (lū-pēr-kal or lū-pēr-kāl), n. pl. Lupercalia (lū-pēr-kāl-i), One of the most important of the Roman feasts, celebrated every year in the middle of February in honour of Lupercus.

You all did see, that on the Lupercal
I thrice presented him a kingly crown,
Which he did thrice refuse. Shak.

Lupiform (lū'pi-form), a. [L. lupus, a wolf, and forma, likeness.] Wolf-like: a characteristic designation of a form of syphilis, in which the clustered tubercles form patches of disorganized skin, and the surface is perforated by deep ulcerated pits.

Lupine (lū'pin), a. Like a wolf; wolfish; ravenous.

Lupine (lū'pin), n. [Fr. lupin; L. lupinus. See LUPINUS.] The common name of the plants of the genus Lupinus (which see).

Lupinine, Lupinite (lū'pin-in, lū'pin-ī), n. A peculiar bitter substance extracted from the leaves of the Lupinus albus.

Lupinus (lū'pī-nus), n. [L., from lupus, a wolf, in allusion to its destroying or exhausting land.] A very extensive genus of hardy annual, perennial, and half-shrubby plants, some of which are commonly cultivated in gardens for the sake of their gaily-coloured flowers; the lupines. They belong to the nat. order Leguminosæ, and inhabit Europe, the temperate parts of North and South America, a few annual species being found in the Mediterranean region. The leaves are simple, digitate, or composed of many leaflets; the flowers are usually blue, violet, or varie-gated, more rarely pink, yellow, or white, in terminal racemes. L. albus is much grown in Italy and Sicily for forage, as well as for the seeds, which are used as food.

Lupous (lū'pus), a. Wolfish; like a wolf. [Rare.]

Lupulin, Lupuline (lū'pū-lin), n. [L. lupulus, hops.] 1. The peculiar bitter aromatic principle of the hop. Called also Lupulite. — 2. The fine yellow powder of hops, which contains the bitter principle. It consists of little round glands, which are found upon the stipules and fruit, and is obtained by drying, heating, and then sifting the hops. It is largely used in medicine.

Lupulite (lū'pū-lit), n. See LUPULIN, 1.
Lupus (lū'pus), n. [L., a wolf.] 1. In astron. one of the southern constellations, situated on the south of Scorpio. — 2. In med. a slow non-contagious tubercular affection, occurring especially about the face, and commonly ending in ragged ulcerations of the nose, cheeks, forehead, eyelids, and lips. It is so termed from its eating away the flesh. It is also called Noli-me-tangere. — Lupus metallorum, the alchemical name of stibnite or sulphide of antimony.

Lurch (lérch), n. [O. Fr. lourche, ourche, It. lurcio, G. lurz, lurtsch, a lurch at cribbage.] A term at the game of cribbage, denoting the position of a player who has not made his thirty-first hole when his opponent has pegged his sixty-first. The loser in such a case is said to be left in the lurch, in French expressed by il demeure louché (Cotgrave). Hence, to leave in the lurch, to leave in a difficult situation or in embarrassment; to leave in a forlorn state or without help. Cotgrave.

Lurch (lérch), v. i. [A form of lurk, as church of kirch, birch of birch, bench of bank, &c. See LURK.] 1. To withdraw to one side or to a private place; to lie in ambush or in secret; to lie close; to lurk.

Fond of prowling and lurching out at night after their own sinful pleasures. Kingsley.

2. To shift; to play tricks.

I am fain to shuffle, to hedge, and to lurch. Shak.

3. To roll suddenly to one side, as a ship in a heavy sea; to stagger to one side, as a tipsy man.

Lurch (lérch), n. [See LURCH, v. i.] Naut. a sudden roll of a ship. — Lee lurch, a sudden roll to the leeward, as when a heavy sea strikes the ship on the weather side.

Lurch (lérch), v. t. [Partly based on LURCH, the gaming term, partly on LURCH, v. i.] 1. To anticipate or outstrip in acquiring something; to deprive of by anticipating; to rob.

You have lurched your friends of the better half of the garland by concealing the part of the plot. B. Jonson.

2. To take or gain privily or secretly before other competitors, or when others do not or cannot; to appropriate; to steal.

The fond conceit of something like a Duke of Venice, put lately into many men's heads by some one or other subtly driving on under this notion his own ambitious ends to lurch a crown. Milton.

3. To leave in the lurch; to deceive; to disappoint.

This is a sure rule, that will never deceive or lurch the sincere communicant. South.

Lurcht (lérch), v. t. [Comp. L. lurco, lurcho, to devour greedily. See also above.] To eat or swallow greedily; to eat up; to devour.

Too far off from great cities may hinder business; or too near lurcheth all provisions, and maketh everything dear. Bacon.

Lurcher (lérch'ér), n. 1. One that lies in wait for larks; one that watches, as to steal, or to betray or entrap; a poacher.

Swift from his play the scudding lurcher flies. Gay.

Especially — 2. A dog that lies in wait for game, as hares, rabbits, partridges, fallow deer, &c., drives them into nets, runs them down or seizes them. This species of dog is said to be descended from the shepherd's dog and the greyhound, and is more used by poachers than sportsmen.

Lurcher (lérch'ér), n. [See LURCH, to eat.] A glutton; a gourmandizer.

Lurdan, Lurdane (lér'dan, lér'dān), a. [O. Fr. lourdān, lourdāin, from lourd, heavy, dull, thick-headed. See LOORD.] Blockish; stupid; clownish; lazy and useless.

In one (chamber)
Red after revel, droned her lurdane knights Slumbering. Tennyson.

Lurdan, Lurdane (lér'dan, lér'dān), n. A clown; a blockhead; a lazy useless person.

Lure (lūr), n. [Fr. leurre, from M.H.G. luodar, a lure, G. luder, carrion, a bait for wild beasts.] 1. In falconry, an object somewhat resembling a bird thrown into the air to recall a hawk, often a bunch of feathers or several wings tied together and attached to a cord. The hawk being accustomed to get pieces of flesh to eat from the lure, this object comes to have a great influence on it, so that it will return when the falconer swings the lure about and whistles or calls. Hence — 2. Any enticement; that which invites by the prospect of advantage or pleasure. 'With a smile made small account of beauty and her lures.' Milton.

Lure (lūr), v. i. To call an animal, especially a hawk.

Standing near one that lured loud and shrill. Bacon.
At whatsoever hour of the day the boy lured for him, and called 'Limo,' were the dolphin never so close hidden, out he would, and come abroad. Holland.

Lure (lūr), v. t. pret. & pp. lured; ppp. luring. 1. In falconry, to attract by a lure, as a hawk; to attract to a lure by the voice.

O, for a falconer's voice,

To lure this tassel-gentle back again! Shak.

2. To entice; to attract; to invite by anything that promises pleasure or advantage. 'Lured on by the pleasure of this bait.' Sir W. Temple.

And various science lures the learned eye. Gay.

Lurid (lūr'id), a. [L. luridus.] Pale yellow, as flame; ghastly pale; gloomy; dismal.

All these thoughts of love and strife
Glimmered through his lurid life. Longfellow.

2. In bot. having a dirty brown colour, a little clouded.

Lurk (lérk), v. i. [Apparently corresponding to N. luska, Dan. luske, to lurk, to skulk; allied to Dan. lur, G. lauer, an ambush or watching; perhaps to lower (v. i.), listen, &c. See LURCH, v. i.] 1. To lie hid; to lie in wait.

Let us lay wait for blood, let us lurk privily for the innocent. Prov. i. 11.

2. To lie concealed or unperceived.

The spectral form of an awful fate dominating all things human and divine might lurk in the background, but it did not obtrude itself or mar the fairness or completeness of that seemingly human life in which the spirit found satisfaction and rest.

Dr. Caird.

Lurker (lérk'ér), n. One that lurks or keeps out of sight.

They are commonly called puff-balls. L. gemmatum, or common puff-ball, acts mechanically as a styptic, by means of its brown spores; L. giganteum, or giant puff-ball, when dry, staunches slight wounds, and the smoke stupefies bees. In a young state it is edible.

Lycopersicum (lī-kō-pér-si-kum), n. [Gr. lykos, a wolf, and persikon, a peach.] A genus of plants closely allied to Solanum, and belonging to the nat. order Solanaceæ. Three or four species, all South American, are known. L. esculentum is the love-apple or tomato. It is distinguished from Solanum by the elongate acuminate connate anthers. They are unarmed, tall, loose-growing herbs, with pinnatisect leaves and pedunculate lax few-flowered cymes.

Lycopod (lī'kō-pōd), n. A plant belonging to the nat. order Lycopodiaceæ.

Lycopode (lī'kō-pōd), n. [Gr. lykos, a wolf, and pous, podos, a foot.] Vegetable brimstone, the highly inflammable powder contained in the spore-cases of Lycopodium clavatum and L. Selago.

Lycopodiaceæ (lī'kō-pō-dī-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. The club-moss tribe; a natural order of vascular acrogens, chiefly inhabiting boggy heaths, moors, and woods. They are intermediate in their general appearance between the mosses and the ferns, and are in some respects allied to the Conifere. They are furnished with a branched, often spreading and creeping stem, and numerous small imbricated leaves. Their mode of reproduction is similar to that of ferns. There are six genera and about 200 species. The only British genus is Lycopodium (which see). Some of the species are violent purgatives. The powder contained in the seed-vessels of all the species is so highly inflammable as to be employed occasionally in the manufacture of fireworks. The lycopods occur in all parts of the globe, but grow most luxuriantly in tropical or mild climates. They vary greatly in size, but the largest of the present day are comparatively small plants. In the carboniferous era they attained a very large size, rivaling trees in their height and the thickness of their stems, as in the case of the Lepidodendron. See LYCOPDIUM.

Lycopodiaceous (lī'kō-pō-dī-ā'shūs), a. Belonging to the Lycopodiaceæ; resembling the Lycopodiaceæ.

Lycopodite (lī-kop'ō-dīt), n. A fossil plant of the genus Lycopodium.

Lycopodium (lī-kō-pō'dī-um), n. [Gr. lykos, a wolf, and pous, a foot, because of the resemblance of the roots.] A genus of plants of the nat. order Lycopodiaceæ, to which it gives the name, occurring in cold, temperate, and tropical ♂, Sporangium, in the axil of bract; c, Spores—magnified.

Lycopodium Selago. a, Leaf; b, Sporangium, in the axil of bract; c, Spores—magnified.

in Britain, of which the most conspicuous is the L. clavatum or common club-moss, the yellow powder in the spores of which burns explosively, and is used for producing theatrical lightning. It is also used for rolling up pills, and for dusting infants. It is known as lycopode or vegetable brimstone. L. Selago, or fir-moss, is a powerful irritant and counter-irritant.

Lycopsis (lī-kop'sis), n. [Gr. lykos, a wolf, and opsis, the face, from some resemblance in the flowers.] A genus of rough annual herbs, nat. order Boraginaceæ, natives of Europe, North Africa, and West and Central Asia. The flowers are small, blue or violet, in terminal scorpioid racemes: the curved corolla-tube distinguishes the genus from Anchusa, with which it is sometimes united. L. arvensis grows in cornfields and by road-sides in Britain.

Lycopus (lī'kō-pūs), n. [Gr. lykos, a wolf, and pous, a foot, in allusion to the resemblance of the leaves to the foot of that animal.] A genus of herbs of the nat. order Labiate, found in marshy places in Europe, Asia, N. America, and Australia. L. europæus is called gypsy-wort (which see).

Lycotropal (lī-kot'rō-pāl), a. [Gr. lykos, a wolf, and tropos, a turning.] In bot. the term applied to an orthotrope ovule curved downwards like a horse-shoe.

Lyddite (līd'it), n. [From Lydd, in Kent, where many experiments with it were made.] A powerful explosive used for artillery shells, and consisting essentially of picric acid exploded by a picrate detonator. Its force is said to be about fifty times that of gunpowder. The French name is melinite.

Lyidian (līd'ian), a. [From Lydia.] 1. Pertaining to Lydia, a country of Asia Minor, or to its inhabitants, who were a voluptuous, effeminate race; hence, soft; effeminate. Hence—2. A term applied to one of the ancient Greek modes, the music in which was of a soft pleasing character.

And ever, against eating cares,
Lap me in soft Lyidian airs. Milton.

—Lydian stone, a Jasper-like siliceous rock used by the ancients as a touch-stone, for which purpose it was originally brought from Lydia. It is found in many countries.

Lye (lī), n. [A Sax. leah, G. lauge, D. loog, Icel. allied to Icel. laug, a bath, and probably L. lavo, to wash.] Water impregnated with alkaline salt imbibed from the ashes of wood; any solution of an alkali: used for cleaning purposes, as for types after printing, ink-rollers, &c.

Lye (lī), n. In rail, a siding or short offset from the main line into which trucks may be run for the purpose of loading and unloading; one of the different sets of rails at a terminus where trucks stand while being loaded or unloaded.

Lye (lī), n. Old spelling of lie, falsehood.

Lyencephala (lī-en-sef'a-lā), n. pl. [Gr. lyō, to loose, and enkephalos, the brain.] A primary division of mammals, according to Owen, characterized by the fact that the cerebral hemispheres are without folds, and leave the cerebellum, the olfactory lobes, and part of the optic lobes uncovered. The hemispheres are not connected together by a corpus callosum. The Lyencephala comprise the Monotremata and Marsupialia.

Lyencephalous (lī-en-sef'al-us), a. Pertaining to the Lyencephala, having the cerebral hemispheres without folds. See LYENCEPHALA.

Lygæus (lī-jē'ūs), n. [Gr. lygaïos, dark, gloomy; from their secretive habits.] A genus of insects of a scarlet colour belonging to the Geocorice or land-bugs.

Lying (lī'ing), ppr. of lie. Being prostrate. See LIE.—Lying panel, a panel in which the fibres of the wood lie horizontally.

Lying (lī'ing), p. and a. Telling a lie; in the habit of telling lies; untruthful; false; mendacious; as, lying lips, a lying tongue. 'Thou most lying slave.' Shak. 'Lying words.' Shelley.

Lying-in (lī'ing-in), n. The act of bearing a child; lying-in.

Lying-in (lī'ing-in), ppr. or a. 1. Being in childbirth; as, a lying-in woman.—2. Pertaining to or relating to childbirth; as, a lying-in hospital.

Lyingly (lī'ing-lī), adv. In a lying manner; falsely; by telling lies.

Lykewake (līk'wāk), n. Same as Lichwake. Lyn, Lyn-hound (līm, līm'hound), n. A dog held in a leash; a lime-hound or limmer. 'Hound or spaniel, brach or lym.' Shak.

Lyn-grass (līm'gras), n. The popular name of plants of the genus Elymus, belonging to the tribe Hordeæ, distinguished by the inflorescence being in simple spikes, very rarely branched; spikelets two to three together; glumes two, both on the same side of the spikelet, without awns, inclosing one to seven florets. The species have an extensive geographical range; nearly all are inhabitants of the temperate zones. One species, E. arenarius, is a native of Britain. They are all coarse grasses.

Lymexylon (lī-meks'ī-lon), n. [Gr. lymē, plague, and xylin, wood, timber.] A genus of sericorn beetles, nearly allied to Elateridæ and Buprestidæ. The grubs are very destructive to oak-trees, especially those of the Lymexylon navale. This species receives its name from the damage caused by the grubs in the Swedish dockyards in the time of Linnaeus.

Lymexylon navale.

Lymiter, † n. Same as Limitour.

Lymnæa (līm-nē'a), n. [Gr. līmnaïos, marshy, from līmne, a marsh.] A genus of pulmoniferous gasteropodous mollusca, found abundantly in our rivers and ponds, particularly the latter; the pond-snails. They inhabit a thin oval or oblong shell, and feed on water-plants.

Lymnite (līm'nīt), n. A kind of fresh-water snail found fossil.

Lymph (līm'f), n. [Fr. lymphe, L. lymphā, allied to limpidus, clear, limpid, or to Gr. nymphē, a nymph, a goddess of moisture, springs, &c.] 1. Water, or a clear transparent fluid like water.

A fountain bubbled up, whose lymph serene
Nothing of earthy mixture might disdain. Trench.

2. In physiol. a fluid in animal bodies contained in certain vessels called lymphatics. Lymph is, like the blood, an alkaline fluid, consisting of a plasma and corpuscles, and coagulates by the separation of fibrin from the plasma. The lymph differs from the blood in its corpuscles being all of the colourless kind, and in the very small proportion of its solid constituents, which amount to only about 5 per cent. of its weight. Lymph may, in fact, be regarded as blood minus its red corpuscles, and diluted with water so as to be somewhat less dense than the serum of blood, which contains about 8 per cent. of solid matter.—Vaccine lymph, the matter collected in a cow-pox vesicle, and which, when transferred either from the cow or a person having the disease from being vaccinated, produces the same disease in others, and gives comparative immunity from small-pox.

Lymphad (līm'fād), n. [Probably a corruption of Gael. longfhada, a galley.] An ancient ship with one mast, not unfrequently in the heraldry of Scotland. The Lymphad is the feudal ensign of the lordship of Lorne, and is borne by the family of Argyll and others of the clan Campbell.

Lymphad.

'Our loch ne'er saw the Campbell lymphads,' said the bigger Highlander. 'She doesna value a Cawmill mair as a Cowan.' Sir W. Scott.

Lymphate, Lymphated (līm'fat-ed), a. [L. lymphatus, pp. of lympho, to drive out of one's senses, to make mad.] Frightened into madness; raving.

Lymphatic (līm-fat'ik), a. 1. Pertaining to lymph.—2. Making enthusiastically; frantic.

Lymphatic (līm-fat'ik), n. 1. † A mad enthusiast; a lunatic.—2. In anat. a vessel in animal bodies which contains or conveys lymph. The lymphatics are small transparent absorbent vessels, which originate in every part of the body, and convey lymph from all parts. As they proceed from their origin, they gradually converge into a succession of branches of increasing size, and terminate in two main trunks called the right and left great lymphatic veins, through which the lymph is poured with the chyle from the thoracic duct into the right and left subclavian veins. With the lacteal vessels of the intestines the lymphatics form what is termed the absorbent system.

Lymphoduct (līm'f-o-duk't), n. [L. lymphā, lymph, and ductus, a duct.] A vessel in animal bodies which conveys the lymph; a lymphatic.

Lymphography (līm'f-og'ra-fī), n. [L. lymphā, lymph, and Gr. graphō, to describe.] A description of the lymphatic vessels, their origin and uses.

Lymph (līm'f), a. Containing or like lymph.

Lyn (līn), n. A waterfall; a linn.

Lyncean (līn-sē'an), a. [L. lynceus, from lynx, lynx. See LYNX.] Pertaining to the lynx.

Lynch (līnsh), v. t. [See LYNCH-LAW.] To inflict pain or punishment upon, without the forms of law, as by a mob, or by unauthorized persons.

Lynch-law (līnsh'la), n. The practice of punishing men for crimes or offences by private unauthorized persons without a legal trial. It is said to have been so called from a Virginian farmer of the name of Lynch, who took the law into his own hands on some occasion by chasing a thief, tying him to a tree, and there flogging him.

Lyndet (līnd), n. The linden or lime-tree.

Lynden-tree (līn'den-trē), n. Same as Lynden-tree.

Lynet (līn), n. Linnen. Spenser.

Lynx (līngks), n. [L. and Gr. lynx.] 1. The European Lynx (Felis lynx).

popular name of several species of the genus Felis, resembling the common cat, oil, pound; ū, Sc. abuno; y, Sc. fey.

Fâte, fâr, fat, fâll; mē, met, hér; pine, pin; nôte, not, môve; tûbe, tub, bull;

but with ears longer and furnished with a pencil of hair, and tail shorter. The lynxes have been long famed for their sharp sight, which character they probably owe to their habit of prowling about at night, and their brilliant eyes. The European lynx is the F. lynx, the Canadian lynx is the F. canadensis. In Asia lynxes are tamed for hunting.—2. One of the northern constellations, situated directly in front of Ursa Major.

Lynx-eyed (lɪŋks'ɪd), a. Having acute sight.

Lyon-court (lɪ'ɒn-kōrt), n. One of the inferior courts of Scotland, having jurisdiction in questions regarding coat-armour and precedence, and also in certain matters connected with the executive part of the law. It is presided over by the lion-king-at-arms (which see).

Lyon-king-at- (or of-) arms. In Scotland, an officer who takes his title of Lyon from the armorial bearings of the Scottish kings, the lion rampant. The officers serving under him are heralds, pursuivants, and messengers. The jurisdiction given to him empowers him to inspect the arms and ensigns-armorial of all the noblemen and gentlemen in the kingdom, to distinguish the arms of the younger branches of families, and to give proper arms to such as deserve them; to matriculate such arms, and to fine those who use arms which are not matriculated. He also appoints messengers-at-arms, superintends them in the execution of their duty, takes cognisance of complaints against them, and fines, suspends, or deposes them for malversation. Called also Lord Lyon.

Lyra (lɪ'ra), n. [L. and Gr. alyra.] 1. In astron. The Lyre, a constellation of the northern hemisphere, surrounded by Cygnus, Aquila, Hercules, and the head of Draco. Its principal star is α Lyrae, of the first magnitude.—2. In anat. a portion of the brain, the medullary fibres of which are so arranged as to give it somewhat the appearance of a lyre.

Lyrate, Lyrated (lɪ'rāt, lɪ'rāt-ed), a. [From lyre.] In bot. shaped like a lyre; divided transversely into several sinuses, the lower ones smaller and more remote from each other than the upper ones; as, a lyrate leaf.

Lyre (lɪ'r), n. [Fr. lyre, L. and Gr. lyra. Etymology uncertain.] 1. One of the most ancient stringed instruments of music, differing from the cithara in that the neck of the former runs behind the upper part of the strings, while the strings of the latter are free on both sides. It was used by the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Greeks. It is said to have had originally only three strings. The number was afterward increased to seven, then to eleven, and finally to sixteen. 2. A constellation. See LYRA.

Various forms of Egyptian, Assyrian, and Greek Lyres.

Lyre† (lɪ'r), n. [A. Sax. hleor, Icel. hlýr, the face, the countenance, the cheek.] The face; the countenance; the cheek; the skin; the complexion. Written also Lire, Lere, Leer.

Lyre-bird (lɪ'r'bɜrd), n. The Menura superba. See MENURA.

Lyric, Lyrical (lɪ'rɪk, lɪ'rɪk-əl), a. [L. lyricus; Gr. lyrikos, from lyra, a lyre.] Pertaining to a lyre or harp.—Lyric poetry, among the ancients, poetry sung to the lyre; in modern usage, commonly poetry composed for musical recitation, but distinctively that class of poetry which has reference to and is engaged in delineating the poet's own thoughts and feelings, as opposed to epic or dramatic poetry, which details external circumstances and events.

Lyric (lɪ'rɪk), n. 1. A composer of lyric poems. Adison.—2. A lyric composition or poem.—3. A verse of the kind commonly used in lyric poetry.

Lyrichord (lɪ'rɪ-kord), n. The name formerly given to a vertical harpsichord.

Lyricism (lɪ'rɪ-sɪzm), n. A lyric composition; a lyrical form of language.

They must have our lyricisms at their fingers' ends. Gray.

Lyrie (lɪ'ri), n. [Icel. hlýri.] A name given in Scotland to the fish more commonly known as the armed bull-head.

Lyrst (lɪ'rɪst), n. A musician who plays on the lyre or harp.

Lysimachia (lɪ-si-māk'i-a), n. [Gr., perhaps from Lysimachus, general of Alexander the Great, and afterwards king of Thrace, or from a physician of this name. Pliny, however, speaks of the soothing and pacifying effects of the plant lysimachia upon oxen that will not draw in the same yoke, so that it may be directly from lysis, a loosening, and machē, strife, which in any case are the ultimate elements.] A genus of herbs, nat. order Primulaceae, containing about sixty species, which differ widely from each other in habit. They have entire, opposite, alternate, or whorled leaves, and axillary or terminal solitary or panicle white, yellow, or red flowers. Four species occur in Britain, known by the name of loosestrife, and one (L. nummularia) is called moneywort. They are chiefly natives of the temperate regions of the northern hemisphere.

Lysis (lɪ'sis), n. [Gr.] In arch. a plinth or step above the cornice of the podium which surrounds the stylobate.

Lyssa (lɪ'ssa), n. [Gr. lyssa, rage, fury, madness.] The madness of a dog; hydrophobia.

Lyterian (lɪ-tɛ'ri-an), a. [Gr. lytērios, from lyō, to loosen.] In med. terminating a disease; indicating the solution of a disease.

Lyth† (lɪθ), v.i. Same as Lithe.

Lythe† (lɪθ), a. Same as Lithe.

Lythe (lɪθ), n. A fish, the coal-fish or whiting pollack at its fourth year.

Lythraceæ (lɪ-thrā'se-ē), n. pl. [See LYTHRUM.] The loosestrife tribe, a nat. order of polypetalous exogens, containing about thirty genera of herbs, trees, and shrubs, of various habit, often with square branches; the leaves usually are opposite or whorled, entire, and shortly petiolate; the inflorescence is usually cymose or paniculate, the flowers being often large and showy. Some, belonging to the genera Lagerstroemia, Diplusodon, &c., are handsome large-flowered bushes in India and South America. The true Lythraceæ are European, North American, and natives of the tropics of both hemispheres. The tulipwood of the cabinet-maker is the trunk of Physocalyx flori-bunda, and Lawsonia inermis produces the henna of oriental ladies. The leaves of Ammannia vesicatoria have a strong urticant smell; they are extremely acrid, and are used by the native practitioners of India to raise blisters, in rheumatism, &c.

Lythrum (lɪ'thrum), n. [Gr. lythron, black-blood—in allusion to the purple colour of most of the flowers.] A genus of plants, the type of the order Lythraceæ. There are about twelve species, widely spread throughout the world. L. Salicaria (spiked purple loosestrife or willow-herb) is one of the most frequent of our British native plants, frequent on the margins of brooks and rivers. It is astringent, and is reputed to be useful in inveterate cases of diarrhoea.

Lytta (lɪ'tta), n. Another name for the genus Cantharis (which see).

M.

M is the thirteenth letter and tenth consonant of the English alphabet, and one of the consonants of the original Indo-European alphabet. It represents a labial and nasal articulation, the compression of the lips being accompanied with the fall of the uvula so as to allow the voice to form a humming sound through the nose, which constitutes the difference between this letter and b. Though this sound might seem to us one of the most simple and natural that the human organs can utter, there are peoples, as the Mohawks and other tribes of North America, who never give utterance to this or any other of the labials (Max Müller). The sound of this letter is quite uniform, being always that heard in man, time, rim. It is never silent in English words proper, though in some words from foreign sources it is not sounded, mnemonic (from the Greek) being one of the few examples. In a good many words it represents an original n, as in hemp=A. Sax. henep, hanep, G. hanf; hamper=hanaper; tempt=L. tentare, time (the tree)=line (linden). On the other hand, an original m is in some words changed to n, as in count (n)=L. comes, count (v)=L. computare, ant=emmet (A. Sax. æmete), &c. This letter is rarely doubled except in composition and inflection, as immortal, dim, dimmed. After m, however, b sometimes forms a kind of doubling of the letter, as in number (L. numerus), timber (G. zimmer). Musum is almost the only English word that ends in double m.—M as a numeral stands for 1000. With a dash or stroke over it, M̄, it stands for a thousand times a thousand, or 1,000,000.—In printing, M is a quadrate the face or top of which is a perfect square. It is the unit or measurement for the species of type used. See EM.—It stands in abbreviations for various words: as, A.M. or M.A. stands for Artium Magister, Master of Arts; M.D. for Medicinæ Doctor, Doctor of Medicine; A.M. for Anno Mundi, the year of the world; MS. for manuscript; MSS. for manuscripts; M.P. Member of Parliament; &c.—M was formerly a brand or stigma impressed on one convicted of manslaughter and admitted to the benefit of clergy.

Ma (mā), [It.] In music, but, as in the phrase, allegro, ma non troppo—fast, but not too much so.

Ma (mā), n. A childish or shorter form of Mamma.

Ma'am (mām), n. A common colloquial contraction for Madam.

Maasha (ma-ash'a), n. An East Indian coin, a little more than the tenth part of a rupee in weight.

Mab (mab), n. [W. mab, a child.] 1. A mythical personage, often represented as the queen of the fairies, though otherwise Titania holds that position. The exquisite description of Mab in Shakspeare's Romeo and Juliet is well known.—2. A slattern. [Provincial.]

Mab (mab), v.i. To dress negligently; to be slatternly. [Provincial.]

Mabble† (mab'l), v.t. To wrap up. See MOBLE.

Mabby (mab'bi), n. A spirituous liquor distilled from potatoes in Barbadoes.

Mac (mak), a. A Gaelic word signifying son, and prefixed to many surnames, as Mac Donald, Mac Grigor, &c. It is synonymous with Son in names of Teutonic origin, Fitz in names of Norman origin, with O in Irish, and with Mab or Map (shortened into Ab or Ap) in Welsh names. It is allied to Goth. magus, a son, fem. magaths (G. magd, a maid), E. may, to be able.

The Fitzes sometimes permitted themselves to speak with scorn of the Os and Macs, and the Os and Macs sometimes repaid that scorn with aversion. Macaulay.

ch, chain; ch, Sc. lock; g, go; j, job;

ñ, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

Macaco (ma-kä'ko), n. 1. Same as Maki.—2. See MACACUS.

Macacus (ma-kä'kus), n. A genus of Asiatic and African monkeys, belonging to the group Cercopithecia, characterized by short tails and prominent eyebrows. M. sinicus is the bonnet-macaque (which see). M. inuus is the Barbary ape or magot, the only monkey found in Europe. It inhabits Egypt and Barbary and the rock of Gibraltar.

Macadamization (mak-ad'am-iz-ä'shon), n. The act or art of macadamizing. Macadamization consists in covering the roadway or forming the road-crust with small broken stones to a considerable depth, and consolidating them by carriages working upon the road, or by rollers, so as to form a hard, firm, and smooth surface.

Macadamize (mak-ad'am-iz), v.t. pret. & pp. macadamized; ppr. macadamizing. [From Macadam, the inventor.] To cover, as a road, way, or path, with small broken stones. See MACADAMIZATION.

Macadam-road (mak-ad'am-röd), n. A road or path formed by macadamization (which see).

Macao (ma-kä'o), n. Same as Macava.

Macaque (ma-käk'), n. [Fr.] A monkey of the genus Macacus (which see).

Macarize (mak'a-riz), v.t. [Gr. makarizō, to bless, from makar, blessed.] To bless; to pronounce happy; to wish joy to; to congratulate. [Rare.]

The word macarize has been adopted by Oxford men who are familiar with Aristotle to supply a word wanting in our language. . . . It may be said that men are admired for what they are, commended for what they do, and macarized for what they have. Whately.

Macaroni (mak-a-rö'ni), n. pl. Macaronis or Macaronies (mak-a-rö'niz). [Fr. and Prov. It. macaroni, It. maccheroni, originally a mixture of flour, cheese, and butter. The use of the word in the 3d and 4th senses (as also of Macaroon, 2) is illustrated by the fact that in several countries a droll or comical fellow is called by the name of a favourite article of food; thus, the English Jack-pudding, the German Hanswurst (Jack Sausage), and the French Jean Farine (John Flour).] 1. A dough of fine wheaten flour made into a tubular or pipe form, varying from the thickness of a goose quill to an inch in diameter, which was first prepared in Italy, and introduced into commerce under the name of Italian or Genoese paste. It is a favourite food among the Italians.—2. A medley; something extravagant or calculated to please an idle fancy. 3. A sort of droll or fool.—4. A fop; a beau; an exquisite; a dandy. The short period that the macaronies led the fashion dates from 1770 to about 1775. They were distinguished by an immense knot of artificial hair, a very small cocked hat, a walking-stick with long tassels, and a jacket, waistcoat, and small-clothes cut to fit the person as closely as possible. (See fig. in next col.)

You are a delicate Londoner; you are a Macaroni; you can't ride. Boswell.

Hence—5. [American.] One of a body of Maryland troops in the revolution remarkable for their showy uniforms.

These were Haslet's Delaware and Smallwood's Maryland regiments; the latter the Macaronis, in scarlet and buff, who had outshone, in camp, their yeoman fellow-soldiers in homespun. W. Irving.

Macaronian (mak-a-rö'ni-an), n. Same as Macaronic.

Macaronic (mak-a-rö'nik), a. 1. Of or pertaining to the food macaroni.—2. Pertaining to or like a macaroni; hence, empty; trifling; vain; affected.—3. Consisting of a mixture or jumble of ill-formed or ill-connected words, or expressed in words of a barbarous or burlesque coinage, as of vulgar words Latinized or Latin words modernized; as, macaronic verse.—Macaronic verse or poetry, properly, a kind of humorous poetry in which, along with Latin, words of other languages are introduced with Latin inflections and construction. The name, however, is sometimes applied to verses which are merely a mixture of Latin and the unadulterated vernacular of the author. [The term was first employed to designate such verse by Teofilo Folengo, a Benedictine, who was born at Mantua 1484 and died 1544, and was selected with reference to the mixture of ingredients in the dish macaroni.]

Macaronic (mak-a-rö'nik), n. 1. A confused heap or mixture of several things.—2. Macaronic verse.

Macaroon (mak-a-rön'), n. [Fr. macaroon. See MACARONI.] 1. A small sweetcake, with almonds in it.—2. A finical fellow or macaroni; a fop.

And no way fit to speak to clouted shoon. Donne.

Macartney (mak-ärt'ni), n. The name given to a species of pheasant (Euplocamus ignitus), a native of China, from having been made known in this country by Lord Macartney during his mission to China. It is a native of Sumatra.

Macaroni and Lady in a dress of 1770-1775.

Macassar-oil (ma-kas'är-oil), n. An oil used for promoting the growth of the hair, so named from Macassar, a district in the island of Celebes, in the Eastern Archipelago, from which it was originally procured. The name is very commonly given to a perfumed mixture of castor-oil and olive-oil.

Macaw (ma-kä'), n. [The native name in the Antilles.] One of a genus (Macrocercus) of beautiful birds of the parrot tribe. The macaws are magnificent birds, distinguished by having their cheeks destitute of feathers, and their tail-feathers long (hence their generic name). They are all natives of the tropical regions of South America. The largest and most splendid in regard to colour is the great scarlet or red and blue macaw (M. Aracanga or macao). Its colour is scarlet with blue markings on parts. The great green macaw (M. militaris) and the blue-and-yellow macaw (M. araruna) are somewhat smaller. Written also Macao.

Macaw-tree (ma-kä'trē), n. The name given to several species of trees of the genus Acrocomia, natives of tropical America, as A. fusiformis and A. sclerocarpa, the fruit of which last yields an oil of a yellowish colour of the consistence of butter, with a sweetish taste and an odour of violets, used by the natives of the West Indies as an emollient in painful affections of the joints, and largely imported into Britain, where it is sometimes sold as palm-oil, to be used in the manufacture of toilet soaps. The great macaw-tree is the A. lasiopatha. They belong to the same tribe as the cocconut palm.

Maccabean (mak-ka-bé'an), a. Pertaining to the Jewish princes called Maccabees, who delivered Judea from the tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes B.C. 167, and rendered it independent for about a century.

Maccabees (mak'ka-béz), n. pl. The name of two books treating of Jewish history under the Maccabean princes, included in our Apocrypha, and accounted canonical by the Roman Catholic Church. There are other two books treating of the history of this period, but the third and fourth appear to have been altogether unknown to the western church.

Maccoboy (mak'kô-boi), n. Same as Mac-coubu.

Maccoubu (mak'kô-ba), n. [From Macoubu, a district in Martinique where the tobacco from which the snuff is made grows.] A kind of snuff flavoured with otto of roses. Spelled also Maccoboy, Maccubau, and Mac-coubu.

Maccubau (mak'ku-bä), n. Same as Mac-coubu.

Mace (mäs), n. [O.Fr. mace, Fr. masse, Fr. massa, It. mazza, a club; from L. mätea, which, however, is only found in the dim. mäteola, a kind of mallet or beetle.] 1. A weapon of war in use in Europe as late as the sixteenth century, and still used among savage tribes. It was a favourite weapon with knights, with the cavalry immediately succeeding them, and at all times with fighting priests, whom a canon of the Church forbade to wield the sword. It consisted of a staff of about 5 feet long, with a metal head frequently in the form of a spiked ball. The heads, however, assumed a variety of forms, but all were constructed so as to inflict severe injury upon an opponent.—2. An ornamented staff of copper, silver, or other metal, resembling the warlike instrument, borne before magistrates and other persons in authority.—3. The heavier rod used in billiards.—4. Fig. a mace-bearer.

He was followed by the maces of the two houses. Macaulay.

5. A currier's mallet with a knobbed face, made by the insertion of pins with egg-shaped heads, used in leather-dressing to soften and supple the tanned hides and enable them to absorb the oil, &c.

Mace (mäs), n. [Fr. maceis, It. mace, L. maceis, maceir, the same with Gr. maker, an Indian spice.] A spice, the dried aril or covering of the seed of the nutmeg (Myristica fragrans), this covering being a fleshy net-like envelope somewhat resembling the husk of a filbert. When fresh it is of a beautiful crimson hue. It is extremely fragrant and aromatic, and is chiefly used in cooking or in pickles. See MYRISTICA.

Mace-ale (mäs'al), n. Ale spiced with mace.

Mace-bearer (mäs'bär-er), n. A person who carries a mace before public functionaries.

Macedonian (mas-e-dö'ni-an), n. 1. A native or inhabitant of Macedonia.—2. A follower of Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, who, in the fourth century, denied the distinct existence and godhead of the Holy Spirit, which he conceived to be merely a divine energy diffused through the universe.

Macedonian (mas-e-dö'ni-an), a. Belonging or relating to Macedonia.

Mace-proof (mäs'prüf), a. Secure against arrest. Shirley.

Macer (mäs'ér), n. A mace-bearer; specifically, in Scotland, an officer attending on the courts of session, teinds, justiciary, and exchequer. Macers are, properly speaking, the servants of the courts, and the attendants on the judges on the bench, and it is their duty to preserve silence in the court, to execute the orders of the judges, to call the rolls of court, and to execute such warrants for the apprehension of delinquents, &c., as are addressed to them.

The chancellor took on himself to send the macers of the privy-council round to the few printers and booksellers who could then be found in Edinburgh, charging them not to publish any work without his license.

Macaulay.

Macer (mās'ér), n. [See MACE, spice.] A medicinal bark described by ancient authors, said to be useful in dysentery.

Macerate (mas'ér-āt), v. t. pret. & pp. macerated; ppr. macerating. [L. macerare, maceratum, to make soft, to waste away, to harass; same root as mass, a lump.] 1. To weaken; to waste away.

Recurrent pains of the stomach, mēgrims, and other recurrent headaches macerate the parts and render the looks of patients consumptive and pining.

Harvey.

2. To subject to hardships; to harass or mortify.

Sorrow which contracts the heart macerates the soul.

Burton.

3. To steep almost to solution; to soften and separate the parts of a substance by steeping it in a fluid, or by the digestive process; as, food is macerated in the stomach.

Maceration (mas'ér-ā'shon), n. [L. maceratio, macerationis, from macerare. See MACERATE.] The act or process of macerating or state of being macerated; (a) the act of making thin or lean. (b) The act of harassing or mortifying. (c) The act, process, or operation of softening and almost dissolving by steeping in a fluid.

The saliva serves for a maceration and dissolution of the meat into a chyle.

Ray.

Mace-reed (mās'réd), n. A plant of the genus Typha; reed-mace (which see).

Machairoidus (ma-kī'rō-dus), n. [Gr. machaira, a sabre, and oidos, a tooth.] A genus of extinct Carnivora, family Felidae, whose remains are met with in miocene, pliocene, and post-tertiary formations. The name is derived from the formidable canines of the upper jaw. Several species have been found, varying in size from a lion to a leopard.

Machete (mā-chā'tā), n. [Sp.] A Spanish implement, resembling a large chopping knife or cutlass, often 2 or 3 feet in length, used for cutting canes, corn, vines, &c.

Machetes (ma-kē'téz), n. [Gr. machētēs, a combatant.] Cuvier's name for a genus of wading birds, including the ruff.

Machiavelian (mak'ī-ā-vē'l'ian), a. Of or pertaining to Machiavel (Nicolo Machiavelli), an Italian writer, secretary and historiographer to the republic of Florence; in conformity to Machiavel's supposed principles; cunning in political management; using duplicity or bad faith; crafty. 'A most barbarous fellow, using Machiavelian atheism.' Bp. Morton. See MACHIAVELIANISM.

Machiavelian (mak'ī-ā-vē'l'ian), n. One who adopts the principles of Machiavel.

Machiavelianism, Machiavelism (mak'ī-ā-vē'l'ian-izm, mak'ī-ā-vē'l-izm), n. The principles or system of statesmanship of Machiavel, who inculcated the systematic subordination of right to expediency, maintaining that all means may be resorted to, however unlawful and treacherous, for the establishment and maintenance of the authority of the ruler over his subjects; political cunning and artifice intended to favour arbitrary power; political immorality.

O France! what in such singular circumstances could poor Rohan's creed and world-theory be that he could 'perform' thereby! Atheism! Alas, no; not even atheism; only Machiavelism. Carlyle.

Machicolate (ma-chik'o-lāt), v. t. To form with machicolations.

Machicolated (ma-chik'o-lāt-ed), a. Having machicolations.

Machicolation (ma-chik'o-lā'shon), n. [L. machicolamentum, O. Fr. mashecoulis, Fr. mâcheouilis, mâchicouilis, machicolation, probably from masche, mâche, mashed or melted matter (comp. mâchefer, slag, and coulter, to flow.) 1. In milit. arch. an opening made through the roof of a portal to the floor above, or in the floor of a projecting gallery, for the purpose of defence, by hurling missiles or pouring through it boiling lead, pitch, &c., upon the enemy.

In the galleries machicolations are formed by the parapet or breast-work b being set out beyond the face of the wall c on corbels a; the spaces between the corbels, being open throughout, are the machicolations. From its striking appearance the corbelled parapet was frequently used where machicolations were not required for the purpose of defence, and the apertures so called were omitted. Machicolations do not appear to have been used earlier than the end of the twelfth century.—2. The act of hurling missiles or of pouring burning liquids through such apertures upon the enemy beneath.

Machicoulis (mā-shē-kō-lē), n. [Fr. mâchicoulis. See MACHICOLATION.] A projecting gallery over gateways or walls insufficiently flanked, open at the bottom between its supporting corbels, to allow of defending the foot of the wall.

Machicolations, Herstmonceux Castle.

Machinal (ma-shē'n'al), a. Pertaining to a machine or machines.

Machinate (mak'ī-nāt), v. t. pret. & pp. machinated; ppr. machinating. [L. machinor, machinatus, from machina. See MACHINE.] To plan; to contrive; to form, as a plot or scheme.

Machination (mak'ī-nā'shon), n. [Fr. See MACHINE.] 1. The act of machinating, or of planning or contriving a scheme for executing some purpose, particularly an evil purpose.—2. That which is planned or contrived; a plot; an artful design formed with deliberation; a hostile or treacherous scheme.

She was forced to carry on, for fear of discovery, machinations which she had at first resorted to in mere wantonness.

Str W. Scott.

Machinator (mak'ī-nāt-ēr), n. One who machinates or forms a scheme, or who plots with evil designs.

He hath become an active and earnest agitator, a murmurer and a machinator.

Str W. Scott.

Machine (ma-shē'n), n. [L. machina, Gr. mēchanē, machine, device, contrivance, from mēchos, means, expedient.] 1. Any contrivance or thing which serves to increase or regulate the effect of a given force or to produce motion; or any object by the intervention of which a moving power is made to act upon any body and overcome the force by which the latter resists the effort to change its state of rest or of motion. Machines are divided into simple, and compound, complex, or complicated. The simple machines are the six mechanical powers, viz. the lever, the pulley, the wheel and axle, the wedge, the screw, and the inclined plane. Compound machines are such as combine two or more of these powers for the production of motion or the transmission and application of force. Compound machines are classed under different denominations according to the forces by which they are put in motion; as, hydraulic machines, pneumatic machines, &c.; or according to the purposes which they are intended to serve; as, agricultural machines, printing machines, spinning machines, &c. The powers employed to give motion through machines to any object are produced by the muscular strength of men and animals, the actions of weights, springs, wind, water, steam, fired gunpowder, gas, air, electricity, &c. The initial force which puts a machine in motion is called the first or prime mover, the point at which that force is applied is called the acting or impelled point, and that in which the effect is produced is the working point.—2. A term of contempt applied to a person whose actions do not appear to be under his own control, but to be directed by some external agency; one who does not appear to act intelligently; a person who acts at the will or bidding of another; a tool.—3. An engine; an instrument of force.

With inward arms the dire machine they load.

Dryden.

4. Any organization by which power is applied and made effective, or a desired effect produced; the whole complex system by which any organization or institution is carried on.

The whole machine of government ought not to bear upon the people with a weight so heavy and oppressive.

Landor.

5. Supernatural agency in a poem, or a superhuman being introduced into a poem to perform some exploit; machinery.

The changing of the Trojan fleet into water-nymphs is the most violent machine in the whole Æneid.

Addison.

The actions, sentiments, conversation, of the heroes and heroines of ancient days were as unnatural as the machines employed to put them in motion.

Ror. Walpole.

6. In England, a public coach; in Scotland, any sort of light vehicle, generally for carrying travellers.

The machine started within a few minutes of the time appointed; the coachman snatched his whip.

Southery.

He had taken a seat in the Portsmouth machine, and proposed to go to the Isle of Wight. Thackeray.

Machine (ma-shē'n), v. t. pret. & pp. machined; ppr. machining. To apply machinery to; to produce by a machine.

Machine-gun (ma-shē'n'gun), n. A gun that is loaded and fired by mechanical means and can discharge a number of projectiles simultaneously or in rapid succession, having usually two or more barrels, as in the case of the Gatling gun, the mitrailleuse, &c. See SUPP.

Machine-made (ma-shē'n'mād), a. Made by a machine or machinery, and not by hand.

Machiner (ma-shē'n'ēr), n. 1. One who tends or works a machine; a machinist.—2. A horse that runs in a machine.

Machine-ruler (ma-shē'n'rōl-ēr), n. A machine which rules paper. Simmonds.

Machinery (ma-shē'n'ēr-i), n. 1. A complicated apparatus, or combination of mechanical powers, designed to increase, regulate, or apply motion and force; as, the machinery of a watch or other chronometer.—2. Machines in general; as, the machinery of a cotton-mill is often moved by a single wheel.—3. Any complex system of means and appliances designed to carry on any particular work, or keep anything in action, or to effect a specific purpose or end; specifically, the agencies, especially supernatural, by which the plot of an epic or dramatic poem, or other imaginative work, is carried on and conducted to the catastrophe; as, the machinery of the Iliad; the machinery of Pope's Rape of the Lock. 'An almost indispensable part of the machinery of state.' Macaulay.

The machinery, madam, is a term invented by the critics to signify that part which the deities, angels, or demons are made to act in a poem. Pope.

Machine-shop (ma-shē'n'shop), n. A workshop in which machines are made, and metals, &c., dressed for machinery.

Machine-tool (ma-shē'n'tōl), n. An adjustable machine, with an automatic feed, for cutting metals into any required shape. Called also Engine-tool.

Machine-work (ma-shē'n'wērk), n. Work done by a machine, as distinguished from that done by hand or manual labour.

Machinist (ma-shē'n'ist), n. [Fr. machiniste. See MACHINE.] 1. A constructor of machines and engines, or one well versed in the principles of machines.—2. One who tends or works a machine.

Macigno (mā-chē'n'yō), n. [It.] A species of siliceous sandstone, of two varieties, one of a grayish-yellow colour, the other of a bluish-gray colour. It belongs apparently to the cretaceous age.

Maciency (mas'ī-en-si), n. [See MACILENT.] Leanness.

Bailey.

Macilent (mas'ī-lent), a. [L. macilentus, from macies, leanness, maceo, to be lean, from root of macer, lean.] Lean; thin; having little flesh. Bailey.

Mackerel (mak'ēr-el), n. [O. Fr. maquerel, Fr. maquereau, D. makreel, G. makrele, Dan. makrel, W. macrell, generally explained as from L. Macarellus, from L. macula, a spot—in allusion to the blue blotches with which the fish is marked. Comp. W. brithyll, a trout, from brith, speckled, variegated. Mahn, however, prefers to derive it from D. makelaar, a broker, from the popular belief mentioned under next article.] A fish of the genus Scomber, the S. scomber of Linnaeus. It is a well known and excellent table fish, and inhabits almost the whole of the European seas. Mackerel, like herring, are caught only when they approach the shore to spawn. The Spanish mackerel (S. colias) has a row of spots along the back; the spotted mackerel (S. maculatus) has many small black points.—Mackerel gale, either a gale that ripples the surface of the sea, or one which is suitable for catching mackerel, as this fish is caught with the bait in motion.—Mackerel mint, spearmint (Mentha viridis).—Mackerel sky, a sky in which the clouds have the form called cirro-cumulus, that is, are broken into fleecy masses. Called also a Mackerel-back sky.

Mackerel (Scomber scomber).

Mackerel (mak'ér-el), n. [O. Fr. maquerel, maqueriau, a mackerel, and also a pander, there being a French popular belief that the mackerel follows the female shads, called vierges or maids, and brings them to the males. If the sense of pander or broker is the original sense, the word is probably derived, as Maht thinks, from D. macker, makelaar, G. mäkler, a broker, an agent, O. H. G. mahhari, an agent, from mahhôn, to do, to transact.] A pander or pimp.

Mackerel-guide (mak'ér-el-gid'), n. A name of the garfish (which see).

Mackerel-midge (mak'ér-el-mij'), n. Motella or Couchia glauca, a minute fish common round the British coasts, and little more than 1 inch in length.

Macintosh, Macintosh (mak'in-tosh), n. [From C. Macintosh, the inventor.] A garment, particularly an overcoat, rendered waterproof by a solution of india-rubber.

Macle (mak'l), n. Same as Macule (which see).

Macle (mak'l), n. [Fr.; L. macula, a spot, the mesh of a net.] 1. In mineral. (a) A term applied to twin-crystals, which are united by simple contact of their faces by interpenetration, or by incorporation. These twin forms are often repeated so as to form groups or compound macles. (b) Chialotile, cross-stone, or hollow-spar, a variety of andalusite, the crystals of which have the axis and angles of different colours. (c) A tessellated appearance in other crystals. — 2. In her. same as Masle.

Macurea (mak-lür's-a), n. [After William Macure, a North American geologist.] A genus of fossil spiral, operculated shells, characteristic of the lower Silurian. They are of large dimensions.

Macurite, Macureite (mak-lür'it), n. [After William Macure, a North American geologist.] A name common to two minerals: (a) a dark-green variety of pyroxene, a bispilicate containing alumina, lime, iron, and magnesia. (b) A fluosilicate of iron and magnesia, also called Chondrodite, Brucite, and Humite. Both minerals are found in metamorphic and igneous rocks.

Macmillanite (mak-mil'an-ít), n. One of the sect of Scottish Presbyterians known also as Cameronians, taking this name from the Rev. John Macmillan, minister of Balmaghie, who became their first ordained clergyman. See CAMERONIAN.

Maçon (mä-koñ), n. [From Maçon, on the Saône, where the grapes grow.] A celebrated red French wine, remarkable for its subtlety and keeping qualities.

Macouba (mak'ö-ba), n. Same as Macouba. Macrauchenia (mak-rä-kë'ni-a), n. [Gr. makros, long, and auchen, the neck.] A genus of extinct perissodactyle mammals, occurring in the tertiaries of South America, resembling the camel or llama, and related also to the rhinoceros.

Macrobatic (mak-ro-bi-ot'ik), a. [Gr. makro-botos, long-lived—makros, long, and bios, life.] Long-lived.

Macrobatics (mak-ro-bi-ot'iks), n. [See preceding article.] The subject or study of long life or longevity. De Quincey.

Macrobatiæ (mak-ro-bi-ot'i-dë), n. pl. [Gr. makros, long, bios, life, and eidos, likeness.] A family of minute vermiform Arachnida, without respiratory organs, known to microscopists as sloth or bear animalcules, or water-bears. They are usually found in moss or in fresh water, and were formerly classed with the rotifers. Their form is usually an elongated oval, and they are furnished with four pairs of short legs, each of which usually bears four little claws. Little or nothing is known of their habits; and the most singular circumstance connected with them is their power of returning to life, like rotifers, when moistened, after having been for a considerable time in a dry and apparently lifeless state.

Macrocephalous (mak-ro-sef'al-us), a. [Gr. makros, large, and kephalê, the head.] 1. Having a large head. — 2. In bot. having the cotyledons of a dicotyledonous embryo confluent, and forming a large mass compared with the rest of the body.

Macrocerus (mak-ro-sér'kus), n. [Gr. makros, large, and kerkos, a tail.] A genus of birds belonging to the Psittacideæ or parrot family; the macaws. See MACAW.

Macrocosm (mak'ro-kozm), n. [Gr. makros, great, and kosmos, world.] The great world; the universe, or the visible system of worlds: opposed to microcosm, or the little world constituted by man.

(Paracelsus) seized hold of a notion which easily seduces the imagination of those who do not ask for rational proof, that there is a constant analogy between the macrocosm of external nature and the microcosm of man. Hallam.

Macrocyttis (mak-ro-sis'tis), n. [Gr. makros, long, and kyttis, a bag.] A genus of marine plants, belonging to the nat. order Algæ. The M. pyrifer exceeds all other vegetable productions in the length of its fronds, some of which have been estimated on reasonable grounds to attain a length of 700 feet. The leaves are long and narrow, and at the base of each is placed a vesicle filled with air for the purpose of enabling the plant to support its enormous length in the water, as its stem is not thicker than the finger, and its upper branches as slender as common packthread. It is found in the southern temperate zone, and along the Pacific as far north as the arctic regions.

Macroductyl (mak-ro-dak'til), n. An individual of the Macroductyli (which see).

Macroductyli (mak-ro-dak'ti-li), n. pl. [Gr. makros, long, and daktylos, a finger.] A family of birds, of the order Grallatoreæ, having very long toes; it comprises the coot, rail, water-hen, the jacana, &c.

Macroductylic, Macroductylous (mak'-ro-dak-ti'lik, mak-ro-dak'til-us), a. Having long toes: applied to a tribe of wading birds. See MACRODUCTYLI.

Macrodiagonal (mak-ro-di-ag'on-al), n. [Gr. makros, long, and E. diagonal.] The longer of the diagonals of a rhombic prism.

Macrodom (mak-ro-dôm), n. [Gr. makros, long, and domos, a house, dome.] In crystal, a dome parallel to the longer lateral axis in the trimetric system. Goodrich.

Macrology (mak-ro-lô-jî), n. [Gr. makros, great, and logos, discourse.] Long and tedious talk; prolonged discourse without matter; superfluity of words.

Macrometer (mak-ro-met'er), n. [Gr. makros, long, and metron, measure.] A mathematical instrument contrived to measure inaccessible heights and objects by means of two reflectors on a common sextant.

Macron (mä-kron), n. Same as Macrotone.

Macropetalous (mak-ro-pet'al-us), a. [Gr. makros, long, and petalon, a petal.] In bot. having large petals, as some species of Ranunculaceæ.

Macrophyllous (mak-ro-fil'us or mak-rof'il-us), a. [Gr. makros, long, and phyllon, a leaf.] In bot. having large leaves.

Macropiper (mak-ro-pi-për), n. [Gr. makros, long, and piperi, pepper.] A genus of dicotyledonous shrubs of the nat. order Piperaceæ, natives of the islands of the Pacific, now more usually regarded as a section of the genus Piper. One species, M. methysticum, furnishes a root called ava or kava, possessing narcotic and stimulant properties, a beverage prepared from which is the national drink of the Polynesians, and is always partaken of before entering upon any important business or religious rite. It is also drunk as a specific for rheumatism. The approved mode of manufacturing the beverage is to extract the juice by chewing, collecting the spittle for use.

Macropod (mak-ro-pod), n. An individual of the family Macropodida.

Macropodal, Macropodous (mak-ro-pod'al, mak-ro-pod-us), a. [Gr. makros, large, and pous, foot.] 1. Large-footed. — 2. In bot. a term applied by Richard to the embryo of grasses, whose cotyledon was mistaken by him for an embryo.

Macropodia (mak-ro-pô'di-a), n. pl. [Gr. makros, long, and pous, a foot.] Latreille's name for a family of brachyurous decapod crustaceans (crabs), remarkable for the enormous length of their feet, which has obtained for them the name of sea-spiders. They generally remain at considerable depths in the sea, and are also found on oyster-banks.

Macropodan (mak-ro-pô'di-an), a. Same as Macropod.

Macropodidæ, Macropidæ (mak-ro-pod'i-dë, mak-ro-pi'dë), n. pl. [See MACROPOUS.] A family of non-placental mammals, of which the genus Macropus is the type. The family formerly comprised kangaroos, kangaroo-rats or potoroos, tree-kangaroos, phalangers, flying-squirrels, koalas, bandicoots, wombats, opossums, &c., animals widely varying in habit and form, some being vegetable-feeders and some carnivorous, but, with the exception of the opossums, all Australasian. Owen restricted the family to the kangaroos proper, and their close congeners belonging to the section Poephaga (grass-eaters) of the order Marsupialia, and his classification has generally been adopted. See KANGAROO.

Macropoma (mak-ro-pô-ma), n. [Gr. makros, long, and pôma, operculum.] A genus of fossil ganoids with homocercal tails, belonging to the cretaceous system; so named from the large operculum. Full-grown specimens are about 2 feet long.

Macropterus (mak-ro-p'tër-us), a. [Gr. makros, long, and pteron, a wing.] In zool. having long wings or fins.

Macropus (mak-ro-pus), n. [Gr. makros, long, and pous, a foot.] A genus of marsupial mammals, the type of the family Macropodidæ; the kangaroos. They have elongated hinder limbs with four toes, fore-feet with five toes, and a well-developed tail. See MACROPODIDÆ, KANGAROO.

Macroscelides (mak-ro-sel'i-dëz), n. [Gr. makros, long, and skelos, the thigh.] A genus of mammals belonging to the order Insectivora, containing several species, all South African, save one found on the coast of Barbary. M. proboscideus, the typical species, a native of the Cape, is about 1 foot in length, and its fur of the colour of that of the hare. It has a long nose, long hind-legs, and the habits of the jerboa. It feeds on insects.

Macrotherium (mak-ro-thë'r-i-um), n. [Gr. makros, long, and therion, a wild beast.] A fossil genus of gigantic mammals, the oldest representatives of the Edentata, found in the miocene tertiaries of France, and intermediate between the pangolin or African ant-eater and the aardvark. It appears to have been destitute of dermal armour, and the teeth are rootless and without enamel.

Macrotone (mak-ro-tôn), n. [Gr. makros, long, and tonos, line.] In gram. a horizontal line placed over vowels to show that they have their long or name sound; as, â in name, é in mê, i in line, ô in hôme, û in tûbe.

Macrotous (mak-ro'tus), a. [Gr. makros, long, and otus, the ear.] In zool. long-eared.

Macrotypous (mak-ro-ti'pus), a. [Gr. makros, long, and typos, form.] In mineral, having a long form.

Macroua (mak-ro'ra), n. See MACRURA.

Macroual, Macrourous (mak-ro'rou'al, mak-ro'rou's), n. See MACRURAL.

Macrouran (mak-ro'rou'an), n. See MACRURAN.

Macrura (mak-ry'ra), n. pl. [Gr. makros, long, and oura, a tail.] A family of stalk-eyed decapod crustaceans, including the lobster, prawn, shrimp. They are so called in contrast to the Brachyura (crabs), in which the abdomen, usually called the apron, is rudimentary and turns forward, lying close below the cephalothorax, while in the Macrura the flexible abdomen is as fully developed as the cephalothorax, and extends straight backward, and is used in swimming.

Macrural, Macrurous (mak-ry'ral, mak-ry'rus), a. Belonging to the family Macrura.

Macruran (mak-ry'ran), n. An individual of the family Macrura.

They rave, recite, and madden round the land. Pope.

Madder (mad'ēr), n. [A. Sax. mæddere, madder.] A plant of the genus Rubia, R. tinctorum, nat. order Rubiaceæ. It is a climbing perennial plant, with whorls of dark green leaves, and small yellowish cross-shaped flowers. The prepared root is used as a red dye-stuff. It yields colours of the greatest permanence, and is employed for dyeing linen and cotton red. Two kinds of it are fixed upon cotton; one is simply called madder-red, and the other, which possesses a much higher degree of lustre and fixity, is called Turkey or Adrianople red, because it was for a long time obtained entirely from the Levant, where it was called alizar.

The colouring principle of madder is termed alizarine.—Madder-lake or madder-carmine, a red pigment made by washing madder with cold water, boiling the residue with a solution of one part of alum in twelve of water, and precipitating the decoction gradually with carbonate of soda or with borax.—Madder-yellow, madder-orange, and madder-purple, are the names of other pigments prepared from madder. The use of madder in dyeing is now almost entirely superseded by that of artificial alizarine (which see).

Madder (mad'ēr), v.t. To dye with madder.

Madder (mad'ēr), v.i. To perform the process of dyeing with madder.

Madding (mad'ing), a. Raging; furious; wild.

2. One inflamed with extravagant passion, and acting contrary to reason.

Madness (mad'nes), n. The state or quality of being mad: (a) a state of disordered reason or intellect; lunacy; distraction.

There are degrees of madness as of folly. Locke.

(b) Extreme folly; headstrong passion and rashness that act in opposition to reason; ungovernable fury or rage; as, the madness of a mob; the madness of despair. 'The cruel madness of love.' Tennyson.—SYN. Distraction, derangement, delirium, craziness, insanity, lunacy, mania, frenzy, frantiness, rage, fury.

Madonna (ma-don'a), n. [It. madonna, from L. mea domina, my lady.] An Italian term of address equivalent to Madam. It is given specifically to the Virgin Mary, like Our Lady in English, and hence pictures representing the Virgin are generally called madonnas.

Madoqua (mad'o-kwa), n. A very tiny antelope of Abyssinia (Antelope saltiana or Neotragus saltiana), about as large as a good-sized hare, and with legs of about the thickness of a lady's finger.

Madrepore (mad-rē-pō'ra), n. See MADREPORE.

Madreporal (mad-rē-pō'ral), a. Of or belonging to madrepores; consisting of madrepores.

Madreporaria (mad'rē-pō-rā'ri-a), n. pl. An order of Coelenterates, sub-class Anthozoa or Actinozoa. It includes several families, to which belong all the reef-building or stone corals (Lithocorallia), or sclerodermic corals (Zoontharia Sclerodermica). The Linnaean Lithophyta included also the gorgonias and other sclerobasic corals.

Madrepore (mad'rē-pōr), n. [Fr.: It. madrepore, from madre, mother, and Gr. pōros, a kind of stone. Others suggest Fr. madré, spotted, and pore, a pore.] A coral-building polype of the genus Madrepore, the type of the family Madreporidae, having twelve short tentacles and a polypidom of stony hardness and of a spreading or branching form. The term, however, is more generally applied to the polypidom itself than to the polype, and in this sense is equivalent to coral. Madrepore consists of carbonate of lime with traces of animal matter, and is formed by gradual deposition in the tissues of the compound polype, so that in course of time the whole presents the appearance of a number of polypes supported on an extraneous body. When the animal matter has been removed, madrepore is of a white colour wrinkled on the surface and full of little cavities, in each of which an individual polype was lodged; the radiating septa of the cavities corresponding to the internal divisions of the animal. Madreporites raise up walls and reefs of coral rocks with astonishing rapidity in tropical climates. The term is often applied to other branching corals than those of the genus Madrepore. See MADREPORA.

Madreporidae (mad-rē-pō'ri-dē), n. pl. The madreporic family. See MADREPORA.

Madreporeform (mad-rē-pō'ri-form), a. In zool. perforated with small holes like a coral; specifically, applied to the tubercle by which the ambulacral system of the echinoderms mostly communicate with the exterior.

Madreporeite (mad-rē-pō'rit), n. 1. A variety of limestone, so called on account of its occurring in radiated prismatic concretions resembling the stars of madreporites. When rubbed it emits the smell of sulphuretted hydrogen gas.—2. Fossil madreporite.

Madrier (mad-rēr' or mad'ri-ēr), n. [Fr.] In milit. engin. (a) a thick plank armed with iron plates, with a cavity to receive the mouth of a petard, with which it was applied to anything intended to be broken down. See PETARD. (b) A plank lined with tin and covered with earth to form roofs over certain portions of military works, in order to afford protection against fires in lodgments, &c. (c) A plank used for supporting the earth in a mine, or in a moat or ditch to support a wall.

Madrigal (mad'ri-gal), n. [Fr. Sp. and Pg. madrigal; It. madrigale, older It. madriale, mandriale, from L. and Gr. mandra, a sheepfold, or any place for sheep and shepherds to take shelter in; and thus madrigal was originally applied to the shepherd's song.] 1. A little amorous poem, consisting of not less than three or four stanzas or strophes, and containing some tender and delicate, though simple thought, suitably expressed. The strophes are generally connected together by rhymes, though this is not absolutely necessary, and indeed the term is used with a certain amount of looseness. The madrigal was first cultivated in Italy, and those of Tasso are among the finest specimens of Italian poetry. Several English poets of the time of Elizabeth and the Charleses wrote madrigals of notable grace and elegance, the chief names being Lodge, Withers, Carew, and Suckling.—2. An elaborate vocal composition now commonly of two or more movements, and in five or six parts. The musical madrigal was at first a simple song, but afterwards was suited to an instrumental accompaniment. There are a number of famous English composers of madrigals.

Madrigalist (mad'ri-gal-ist), n. A composer of madrigals. D. Burney.

Madrikenian (mad-ri-lē'ni-an), a. Of or belonging to Madrid.

Madrikenian (mad-ri-lē'ni-an), n. A native or inhabitant of Madrid.

Madriessa. See MEDRISSA.

Madwort (mad'wört), n. The common name of several plants, chiefly of the genus Alysum, so called because they were formerly used as a remedy in canine madness.

Mae (mä) [A. Sax. mā, more, O.E. moe, ma.] More. [Scotch.]

Magbote, Magbot (mag'böt), n. [A. Sax. mæg, kinsman, and bote, compensation.] An ancient term signifying compensation for the slaughter of a kinsman.

Maelstrom (mä'lstrom), n. Lit. mill-stream; a celebrated whirlpool on the coast of Norway, near the island of Mosko. Under certain conditions of wind and tide it rages violently so as to be heard several miles, and it may even engulf small vessels which approach it. Hence, fig. a vortex or gulf; some dangerous movement or current in social life leading many to ruin.

Maffler (maf'lēr), n. A stammerer.

Magazine (mag-a-zēn), n. [Fr. magasin, a storehouse, Sp. magacen, almagacen, from Ar. al-makhzen, a storehouse, a warehouse, from khazana, to store.] 1. A receptacle in which anything is stored; a warehouse; a storehouse; specifically, (a) a strong building, constructed generally of brick or stone, for storing in security large quantities of gunpowder or other explosive substances, and warlike stores, either for industrial or military purposes, (b) The close room in the hold of a man-of-war where the gunpowder is kept. (c) The cartridge chamber of a magazine rifle (which see). (d) The fuel chamber of a magazine stove (see below). 'A magazine of all necessary provisions.' Raleigh. 2. A pamphlet periodically published, containing miscellaneous papers or compositions. The first publication of this kind in England was the Gentleman's Magazine, which was first published in 1731 by Edward Cave, under the name of Sylvanus Urban, and which is still continued, though its character is now entirely changed.—Magazine cartridge-box, a cartridge-box in which the cartridges are so arranged that they can easily be got at when wanted for loading.—Magazine rifle, a rifle containing a supply of cartridges, which are automatically fed to the chamber at the rear end of the barrel.—Magazine stove, a stove containing a fuel-chamber from which the fire is automatically fed with coal as that in the grate burns away.

Magazine (mag-a-zēn), v. t. To store up or accumulate for future use.

Magazine (mag-a-zēn), v. i. To conduct or edit a magazine.

Of magazing chiefs, whose rival page
With monthly medley courts the curious age.

Magaziner, Magazinish (mag-a-zēn'ēr, mag-a-zēn'ist), n. One who writes in a magazine. 'If a magaziner be dull.' Goldsmith.

Magbote (mag'böt). See MÆGBOTE.

Magdalen (mag'da-len), n. [From Mary Magdalene, who has been supposed to be the woman mentioned in St. Luke vii. 36-50.] A reformed prostitute; an inmate of a female penitentiary.—Magdalen hospital or Magdalen asylum, a house or establishment into which prostitutes are received with a view to their reformation; a female penitentiary.

Magdaleon (mag-dā'lē-on), n. [Gr. magdalia, the crumb or soft part of bread, from massō, to knead.] In med. (a) a medicine, as a pill, prepared with bread crumb. (b) A roll of plaster. Dunglison.

Magdeburg Hemispheres (mag'dē-bērg he'mi-sfērz), n. pl. [From having been first constructed by Otto Guericke of Magdeburg.] An apparatus for ascertaining the amount of the atmospheric pressure on a given surface. It consists of two hollow brass hemispheres, furnished with handles, and so formed that when placed mouth to mouth they shall be in air-tight contact. In this state the air is exhausted from the inside by means of the air-pump, when it will be found that the hemispheres adhere together with considerable force, owing to the pressure of the atmosphere on their external surfaces. If, then, the area of the section of the sphere through the centre be known, and the force required to pull the hemispheres asunder be ascertained, the pressure exerted by the atmosphere on a square inch of surface may be found, supposing the exhaustion of the hemispheres to be complete. The atmospheric pressure, however, is much more accurately ascertained by the barometer.

Mage (mä), n. [L. magus, from Gr. magos, a Magian, from Per. mag, a priest—probably from same root as L. magnus, Gr. megas, great.] A Magician. Spenser.

And there I saw mage Merlin, whose vast wit
And hundred winters are but as the hands
Of loyal vassals toiling for their liege. Tennyson.

Magellanic (mag-el-lan'ik), a. Pertaining to Magellan, the celebrated Portuguese navigator.—Magellanic clouds, three conspicuous whitish nebulae, of a cloud-like appearance, near the south pole.

Magenta (ma-jen'ta), n. A brilliant blue-red colour derived from coal-tar. It was so named because it was discovered in 1859, the year of the battle of Magenta. Called also Fuchsine.

Magg (mag), v. t. [The most probable explanation of the word is that it is Gypsy slang, and allied to Hind. makr, fraud, makkār, a cheat, a knave.] To steal; to carry off clandestinely. [Low slang.]

Magg (mag), n. 1. A cant word for a half-penny.—2. pl. The gratuity which servants expect from those to whom they drive any goods. [Scotch.]

Maggimonifet (mag-gi-mōn'i-fēt), n. [Maggy many feet.] A centipede. [Scotch.]

Maggiore (maj-jō'rā), a. [It.] In music, major, as a scale or interval.

Maggot (mag'ot), n. [Probably from W. macai, pl. maceiod, magiod, a maggot or grub, from magru, to breed.] 1. The larva of a fly or other insect; a grub; a worm.—2. A whim; an odd fancy; a crotchet. 'The maggot born in an empty head.' Tennyson.

Magian (mä'ji-an), n. One of the caste of the Persian Magi; one of the priests of the Zoroastrian religion. Their knowledge was deemed to be supernatural.

Magianism (mä'ji-an-izm), n. The philosophy or doctrines of the Magi.

Magic (maj'ik), n. [L. magicus, pertaining to sorcery, from magia, Gr. mageia, the theology of the Magians, magic. See MAGE.] 1. The art or pretended art or science of putting into action the power of spirits, or the science, art, or practice of producing wonderful effects by the aid of superhuman beings or of departed spirits, or the occult powers of nature; sorcery; enchantment; necromancy. 'If she in chains of magic were not bound.' Shak.—2. Power or influence similar to that of enchantment; as, the magic of love.—Natural magic, the art of applying natural causes to produce surprising effects.

The writers of natural magic attribute much to the virtues that come from the parts of living creatures, as if they did infuse immaterial virtue into the part severed. Bacon.

—Celestial magic attributes to spirits a kind of dominion over the planets, and to the planets an influence over men.—Superstitious or gothic magic consists in the invocation of devils or demons, and supposes some tacit or express covenant or agreement between them and human beings.

Magic (maj'ik), a. 1. Pertaining to magic; used in magic; as, a magic wand; magic art. 'Magic verses.' Shak.

And pluck my magic garment from me. Shak.

2. Using or having power to use magic. 'The magic prophetess.' Waller.—3. Working or worked by or as if by magic.—[Magic differs from magical chiefly in the fact that it is not used predicatively. Thus we do not say the effect was magic. Moreover we do not speak of a magical lantern. See MAGICAL.]—Magic square, a square figure formed by a series of numbers in mathematical proportion, so disposed in parallel and equal ranks as that the sums of each row or line taken perpendicularly, horizontally, or diagonally are equal.—Magic lantern, a kind of lantern invented by Kircher, by means of which small images are represented on the wall of a dark room or on a white sheet, magnified to any size at pleasure. It consists of a closed lantern or box, in which are placed a lamp and a concave mirror (as at A), which reflects the light of the lamp through the small hole of a tube in the side of the lantern, which is made to draw out.

Magic Lantern.

At the end of this tube, next to the lamp, is fixed a plano-convex lens (B), and at the other a double-convex lens (D). Between the two lenses are successively placed (at C) various slips of glass, with transparent paintings, representing various subjects, which are thrown in a magnified form on the wall or screen opposite to the lantern and spectators.

Magical (maj'ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to magic; proceeding from magic; having supernatural qualities; as, magical powers or arts. 'The magical shield of your Ariosto.' Dryden.—2. Acting or produced as if by magic; as, the effect of the restorative was magical. 'His name, that magical word of war.' Shak.—3. Having the power of using magic; said of persons. Sir T. Herbert.—[For distinction between Magical and Magic see MAGIC, a.]

Magically (maj'ik-al-li), adv. In a magical manner; by the arts of magic. 'A ring magically prepared.' Camden.

Magician (ma-jish'an), n. One skilled in magic; an enchanter; a necromancer. Shak.
Magilp, Magilph (ma-gilp', ma-gil'f), n. A gelatinous compound used by artists as a vehicle for colours. It is produced by mixing linseed-oil and mastic varnish together. Written also Megilp, Megilph.

Magilus (maj'il-us), n. A genus of gastropodous molluscs, containing only one species (M. antiquus), which lives in masses of coral. The shell is at first an ordinary spiral, but as the coral grows it is prolonged into a tube directed outward to the surface of the coral, so that the animal may always be in contact with the surface of the water. The tube may be 3 feet long, the lower part being filled with calcareous matter.

Magister (ma-jis'tér), n. [L., from mag, root of magnus, great, as minister from min, root of minor, less.] Master; sir; an appellation given in the middle ages to persons of scientific or literary distinction, equivalent to the modern title of Doctor.

Magisterial (maj-is-tér-i-al), a. [See MAGISTRATE.] 1. Pertaining to a master; such as suits a master; authoritative; proud; lofty; arrogant; imperious; domineering.

Pretenes go a great way with men that take fair words and magisterial looks for current payment.

Sir R. L'Esrange.
2. Of or belonging to a magistrate or his office; of the rank of a magistrate.

The third estate consisted of 578, and of these only 32 were clerical, noble, or magisterial.

Brougham.
3. In chem. pertaining to magistrery (which see).—Magisterial, Dogmatic, Arrogant. Magisterial applies to the manner of saying or doing a thing—assuming the tone and gesture of a superior or master. Dogmatic characterizes the temper and manner of saying something; we are not dogmatic from any exaggerated idea of our own importance, but because we have implicit faith in the truth of what we say, and imagine that others should naturally be in the same way of thinking. Arrogant implies the assumption of more than due authority from an over-estimate of one's importance.

He uses a magisterial authority while he instructs him. South.

A dogmatic spirit inclines a man to be censorious of his neighbours. Watts.

An arrogant way of treating with other princes and states is natural to popular governments.

Sir W. Temple.
SYN. Authoritative, lofty, imperious, proud, haughty, domineering, despotic, arrogant.

Magisterially (maj-is-tér-i-al-li), adv. In a magisterial manner: (a) with the air of a master; arrogantly; authoritatively. (b) In the capacity of a magistrate.

Magisterialness (maj-is-tér-i-al-nes), n. The state or quality of being magisterial; the air and manner of a master; haughtiness; imperiousness; peremptoriness.

Magistry (maj'is-tér-i), n. [L. magisterium, the office of a master or guide.] 1. A magisterial injunction; a command which can be enforced. [Rare.]

This last was not a magistry, but a mere command.

Brougham.
2. In chem. a term formerly given to various extracts or preparations, especially to certain precipitates, as that seen when water is added to a solution of bismuth in nitric acid.
3. Any kind of medicine or remedial agency claiming to be of exceptional efficacy; a magistral.

Magistracy (maj'is-tra-si), n. [See MAGISTRATE.] 1. The office or dignity of a magistrate.—2. The body of magistrates.

That enlightened, eloquent, sage, and profound body, the Magistracy of London. Dickens.

Magistral (maj'is-tral), a. 1. Suiting a magistrate; magisterial; authoritative.—2. Pertaining to a sovereign medicine or remedy. 'Some magistral opiate.' Bacon.—Magistral line. See MAGISTRAL, n. 2.

Magistral (maj'is-tral), n. 1. † A sovereign medicine or remedy.—2. In fort. the line where the scarp of a permanent fortification, if prolonged, would intersect the top of the coping or cordon. It is the master line, which regulates the form of the work. Called also Magistral Line.—3. The roasted and pulverized copper of pyrites added to the ground ores of silver for the purpose of decomposing the horn-silver present.

Magistrality (maj-is-tral'i-ti), n. Despotie authority, as in the matter of opinion. 'Those who seek truths, and not magistrality.' Bacon.

Magistrally (maj'is-tral-li), adv. Authoritatively; magisterially. Bramhall.

Magistrand (maj-is-trand'), n. [L. magistrandus, from magister, signifying in medieval Latin to make a master (as in arts) of, to confer a university degree upon, from magister, a master.] A designation given in the University of Aberdeen to a student in arts in the last year of his curriculum.

Magistrate (maj'is-trät), n. [L. magistratus, a magistrate, from magister, a master. See MAGISTER.] A public civil officer invested with the executive government or some branch of it. In this sense a king is the highest or first magistrate in a monarchy, as is the president in a republic. But the word is more particularly applied to subordinate officers, to whom the executive power of the law is committed, either wholly or in part, as governors, intendants, prefects, mayors, justices of the peace, and the like. In England the term is usually restricted to justices of peace in the country, and to police and stipendiary magistrates in London and the larger towns; and in Scotland to the provost and bailies in burghs.

The obvious definition of a monarchy seems to be that of a state, in which a single person, by whatsoever name he may be distinguished, is intrusted with the execution of the laws, the management of the revenue, and the command of the army. But, unless public liberty is protected by intrepid and vigilant guardians, the authority of so formidable a magistrate will soon degenerate into despotism. Gibbon.

Magistratic (maj-is-trät'ik), a. Of or pertaining to a magistrate; having the authority of a magistrate. 'Magistratic or ecclesiastic power and order.' Jer. Taylor.

Magistratral (maj-is-trät'ik-al), a. Same as Magistratic. Godwin. [Rare.]

Magistrature (maj'is-trät-ür), n. Magistracy. [Rare.]

Magna (mag'ma), n. [Gr., a mass, salve, dregs, from root mag, to knead.] 1. The generic name of any crude mixture of mineral or organic matters in a thin pasty state.
2. In med. (a) the thick residuum obtained after expressing certain substances to extract the fluid parts from them. (b) The grounds which remain after treating a substance with water, alcohol, or any other menstruum. (c) A salve of a certain degree of consistence.—3. A confection.

Magna Charta (mag'na kár'ta), n. [L., great charter.] 1. The great charter of the liberties (Magna Charta Libertatum) of England, signed and sealed by King John in a conference between him and his barons at Runnymede, June 19, 1215. Its most important articles are those which provide that no freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or proceeded against except by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land, and that no scutage or aid should be imposed in the kingdom (except certain feudal dues from tenants of the crown), unless by the common council of the kingdom. The remaining and greater part of the charter is directed against abuses of the king's power as feudal superior. The charter granted by Henry III. is only a confirmation of that of his father King John. Hence—2. A fundamental constitution which guarantees rights and privileges.

Magnality (mag-nal'i-ti), n. Something great; a great or striking deed or feat. Sir T. Browne.

Magnanimity (mag-na-nim'i-ti), n. [L. magnanimitas. See MAGNANIMOUS.] The quality of being magnanimous; greatness of mind; elevation or dignity of soul, which encounters danger and trouble with tranquillity and firmness, which raises the possessor above revenge, and makes him delight in acts of benevolence, disdain injustice and meanness, and prompts him to sacrifice personal ease, interest, and safety for the accomplishment of useful and noble objects.

Sir Thomas Elyot (1535) speaks of the now familiar words 'frugality,' 'temperance,' 'sobriety,' and 'magnanimity,' as being not in his day in general use; magnanimity, however, is in Chaucer.

Trench.
Magnanimous (mag-nan'im-us), a. [L. magnanimus—magnus, great, and animus, mind.] 1. Great of mind; elevated in soul or in sentiment; raised above what is low, mean, or ungenerous; brave; dauntless; heroic; as, a magnanimous prince or general.—2. Dictated by magnanimity; exhibiting nobleness of soul; liberal and honourable; not selfish.

There is an indissoluble union between a magnanimous policy and the solid rewards of public prosperity and felicity. Washington.

Magnanimously (mag-nan'im-us-li), adv. In a magnanimous manner; with greatness of mind; bravely; with dignity and elevation of sentiment.

A complete and generous education fits a man to perform justly, skilfully, and magnanimously, all the offices of peace and war. Milton.

Magnase (mag'näs), a. A term applied to an excellent black colour, which dries rapidly.

Magnase black is the best of all blacks for drying in oil without addition, or preparation of the oil; it is a colour of vast body and tinging power. Weale.

Magnate (mag'nät), n. [L. magnates (pl.) from magnus, great.] 1. A person of rank; a noble or grandee; a person of note or distinction in any sphere; as, a literary magnate.

More than one of the magnates who bore that wide-spread name. Macaulay.

Specifically—2. One of the nobility or persons of rank forming the House of Magnates in the national representation of Hungary.

Magnes, Magnes-stone (mag'néz, mag'néz-stón), n. [L., from Gr. magnēs.] A magnet.

On thither syde an hideous rocke is pight Of mightie magnes-stone. Spenser.

Magnesia (mag-né'shi-a), n. [From Magnesia in Asia Minor, whence also magnet, L. magnēs. Pliny describes a white kind of magnes which did not attract iron, and which is conjectured to have been carbonate of magnesia.] Oxide of magnesium. It is a white tasteless earthy substance, possessing alkaline properties, and having a sp. gr. of 2.3. It is absorbent, antacid, and mildly cathartic. It is almost insoluble. It is found native in the state of hydrate and carbonate, and exists as a component part of several minerals. In com. pure magnesia is generally distinguished by the term calcined magnesia, and is readily obtained by exposing its hydrated carbonate to a red heat. The hydrated carbonate goes by the name of magnesia, or magnesia alba. The chief use of magnesia and its carbonate is in medicine. Sulphate of magnesia is known by the name of Epsom-salt, having been first obtained from a spring at Epsom. It is a useful purgative medicine, and is also employed in the preparation of magnesia and its carbonate.

Magnesian (mag-né'shi-an), a. Pertaining to or partaking of the qualities of magnesia; containing or resembling magnesia.—Magnesian limestone, (a) properly, a rock composed of carbonates of lime and magnesia, the latter amounting in some cases to nearly a half. There are several varieties, more or less useful for building or ornamental purposes, which are included under the generic term dolomite (which see). (b) A name frequently given to the whole Permian formation, from the above rock being very largely developed in it.

Magnesite (mag'nēs-īt), n. A term which at first included two distinct species of minerals, viz. sepiolite or meerschaum, the hydrated silicate of magnesium; and what is now recognized as magnesite proper, or the anhydrous carbonate of magnesia. The two are frequently found combined, and always in metamorphic rocks containing magnesia, as talc schist, serpentine, &c.

Magnesium (mag-nē'shi-um), n. Sym. Mg. At. wt. 24.5. The metallic base of magnesia. It may be obtained by decomposing chloride of magnesium by means of potassium. It is of a white colour like silver; its lustre is metallic and brilliant; it is very malleable, and fuses at a red heat. Heated to redness in oxygen gas, it burns with brilliancy, and combining with oxygen becomes magnesia, or the oxide of magnesium (MgO). This light is rich in chemical rays, and is now employed to some extent in photography. The chief salts are the carbonate, the chloride, the sulphate (Epsom-salt), the phosphates and the silicates, among which are such minerals as chrysotile, meerschaum, soapstone, and serpentine.

Magnet (mag'net), n. [L. magnes, magnetis; Gr. magnēs, a magnet or magnetic iron-ore, from Magnesia, in Asia Minor, whence the stone was first brought.] 1. The loadstone; an ore of iron which has the peculiar properties of attracting metallic iron, of pointing to the magnetic poles of the earth when freely suspended, and of dipping or inclining in a perpendicular plane on being removed from the equator. These properties it communicates to iron or steel by contact.—2. A bar or mass of iron or steel to which the peculiar properties of the loadstone have been imparted, either by contact or by other means: called in distinction from the loadstone an Artificial Magnet. Such a magnet, temporarily produced by an electric current passing through a wire coiled round a bar of soft iron, is called an Electro-magnet.—Horse-shoe magnet, an artificial magnet in the shape of a horse-shoe.

Horse-shoe Magnet.

Magnetic (mag-net'ik), a. 1. Pertaining to the magnet or magnetism; possessing the properties of the magnet, or corresponding properties; as, a magnetic bar of iron, or a magnetic needle.—2. Pertaining to the earth's magnetism; as, the magnetic north; the magnetic meridian. (See sub-entries below.)—3. Attractive, as if magnetic. 'She that had all magnetic force alone.' Donne.—Magnetic amplitude, azimuth, &c., in navig. the amplitude, azimuth, &c., indicated by the compass.—Magnetic battery, a kind of battery formed of several magnets (usually horse-shoe magnets) combined together, with all their poles similarly disposed; called also a Magnetic Magazine or a Compound Magnet.—Magnetic compensator, a contrivance connected with a ship's compass for compensating or neutralizing the effects upon the needle of the iron of the ship.—Magnetic curves, the name given to those curves into which an infinite number of very minute needles would arrange themselves when placed round a magnet, and at liberty to move round an axis. An idea of these curves is given by the appearance of iron filings when scattered upon a sheet of paper and agitated immediately above a magnet, as shown in the annexed figure.—Magnetic dip. Same as Dip of the Needle. See under DIP.—Magnetic equator, a line passing round the globe near its equator, in every part of which the dip of the needle is nothing. The general inclination of the magnetic to the terrestrial equator is about 12°.—Magnetic fluid, a hypothetical fluid, by which the phenomena of magnetism have been accounted for.—Point of magnetic in- difference, that point of a magnet, about midway between the two extremes, where the attractive force, after continually diminishing as we proceed from either pole, ceases altogether.—Magnetic induction, the power which a magnet or current of electricity possesses of exciting temporary or permanent magnetism in such bodies in its vicinity as are capable of receiving it.—Magnetic intensity, the force of attraction which magnets exert on surrounding bodies capable of being influenced by them, or which the earth exerts on magnets at different places. The intensity of the attractive force exercised by the north pole of one magnet on the south pole of another, and its repulsive force on the north pole of the second, varies inversely as the square of the distance of those poles. On the earth there are three points of maximum magnetic intensity, two in the northern and one in the southern hemisphere.—Magnetic iron-ore. Same as Magnetite.—Magnetic meridian of any place, a great circle, the plane of which passes through that place, through the centre of the earth, and the direction of the horizontal magnetic needle. The angle which the magnetic meridian makes with the true geographical is different in different places and at different times, and is called the variation of the compass.—Magnetic needle, any small magnetized iron or steel rod turning on a pivot, such as the needle of the mariner's compass.—Magnetic north, that point of the horizon which is indicated by the direction of the magnetic needle. It is seldom the true north.—Magnetic points of convergence, the magnetic poles of the earth, around which are drawn the isogonic lines, or lines of equal declination.—Magnetic poles of the earth, two nearly opposite points on the earth's surface where the dip of the needle is 90°. They are at a considerable distance from the poles of the earth.—Magnetic pyrites, a bronze-yellow magnetic sulphide of iron, varying in composition from FeS₂ to Fe₂S₃. It is found in metamorphic and igneous rocks. Called also Pyrrholite.—Magnetic telegraph, the electric telegraph. See TELEGRAPH.

Magnetic (mag-net'ik), n. Any metal, as iron, steel, nickel, cobalt, &c., which may receive the properties of the loadstone.

Magnetical (mag-net'ik-al), a. Same as Magnetic, but less common.

Magnetically (mag-net'ik-al-ly), adv. In a magnetic manner; by magnetism.

Magneticalness (mag-net'ik-al-nes), n. The quality of being magnetic.

Magnetician (mag-net-i'shan), n. One skilled in magnetism; a magnetist.

Magnetiness (mag-net'ik-nes), n. The quality of being magnetic; magneticalness.

Magnetics (mag-net'iks), n. The science or principles of magnetism.

Magnetiferous (mag-net-if'er-us), a. Producing or conducting magnetism.

Magnetism (mag'net-izm), n. 1. That peculiar property, occasionally possessed by certain bodies (more especially by iron and some of its compounds), whereby, under certain circumstances, they naturally attract or repel one another according to determinate laws.—2. That branch of science which treats of the properties of the magnet, and magnetic phenomena in general.—3. Power of attraction; as, the magnetism of interest.—Animal magnetism, a sympathy supposed to exist between the magnet and the human body, by means of which the magnet is said to be able to cure diseases. The same name was given by Mesmer to certain phenomena produced by the action of one person upon another, from a fancied analogy between the action of the mineral magnet and that of the animal energy, or vis vite, to which these effects were attributed. See MESMERISM.—Terrestrial magnetism, the name given to the magnetic properties which the earth as a whole possesses, which give the needle its directive power, and cause it to dip, and which also communicate magnetism to iron or steel placed in certain situations. It is found that all metals are more or less susceptible of magnetism.

Magnetist (mag-net-ist), n. One versed in the science of magnetism; a magnetician.

Magnetite (mag-net-it), n. [Named from its magnetic properties.] A black oxide of iron, which sometimes possesses polarity, and is highly magnetic; magnetic iron ore. It is found crystalline or granular. Part of the iron may be replaced by magnesium, or titanium or copper, yielding varieties of the ore. The typical composition is iron 72.4, oxygen 27.6. It is chiefly found in metamorphic, but sometimes also in igneous rocks.

Magnetizable (mag-net-iz'a-bl), a. Capable of being magnetized.

Magnetization (mag-net-iz-ā'shon), n. The act of magnetizing, or state of being magnetized.

Magnetize (mag-net-iz), v.t. pret. & pp. magnetized; ppr. magnetizing. 1. To communicate magnetic properties to; as, to magnetize a needle.—2. To attract as if by a magnet; to move; to influence. 'Thoroughly fascinated, magnetized, as it were, by his character.' Motley.—3. To put under the influence of animal magnetism.

Magnetize (mag-net-iz), v.i. To acquire magnetic properties; to become magnetic; as, a bar of iron standing some time in an inclined position will magnetize.

Magnetizee (mag-net-iz-ē), n. One put under the influence of animal magnetism. [Rare.]

Magnetizer (mag-net-iz-ēr), n. One who or that which communicates magnetism.

Magneto-electric, Magneto-electrical (mag-net'ō-ē-lek'trik, mag-net'ō-ē-lek'trik-al), a. Pertaining to magneto-electricity.—Magneto-electric induction, the communication of magnetic properties to iron by means of electric currents.—Magneto-electric rotary machine, an apparatus for rendering the magneto-electric induction currents continuous, and for converting their alternating direction into a constant one.

Magneto-electricity (mag-net'ō-ē-lek'tris'i-ti), n. 1. Electricity evolved by the action of magnets.—2. That branch of science which treats of phenomena in which the principles of both magnetism and electricity are involved.

Magnetograph (mag-net'ō-graf), n. [E. magnet, and Gr. grapho, to write.] A self-acting instrument for registering, by photography or otherwise, the states and variations of any of the terrestrial magnetic elements.

Magnetometer (mag-net-om-ē-tēr), n. [E. magnet, and Gr. metron, a measure.] An instrument for measuring any of the terrestrial magnetic elements, as the dip, inclination, and intensity, especially the latter.

Magnetometric (mag-net'ō-mēt'rik), a. Pertaining to or employed in the measurement of magnetic forces; obtained by means of a magnetometer.

A valuable series of hourly magnetometric observations was continued, night and day, throughout the whole period of our stay at the island.

Ross's Antarctic Expedition.

Magnetomotor (mag-net'ō-mō'tor), n. [E. magnet, and L. motor, a mover, from moveo, to move.] A voltaic series of two or more large plates, which, producing a great quantity of electricity of low tension, is well adapted to the exhibition of electro-magnetic phenomena.

Magnifiable (mag-ni-fi-a-bl), a. Capable of being magnified; worthy of being magnified or extolled.

Magnific, Magnifical (mag-ni'fik, mag-ni'fik-al), a. [L. magnificus, noble, splendid—magnus, great, and facio, to make.] Grand; splendid; illustrious.

O parent! these are thy magnific deeds. Milton.

Magnifically (mag-ni'fik-al-ly), adv. In a magnificent manner.

Magnificat (mag-ni'fi-kat), n. [L., third pers. pres. ind. of magnifico, to magnify: 'doth magnify.'] The song of the Virgin Mary, Luke i. 46: so called because it commences with this word in the Latin Vulgate.

Magnificate† (mag-ni-fi-kāt), v.t. To magnify or extol. Marston.

Magnification (mag-ni'fi-kā'shon), n. The act of magnifying. [Rare.]

Magnificence (mag-ni-fi-sens), n. [L. magnificētia.] The condition or quality of being magnificent: (a) grandeur of appearance; splendour of show or state; as, the magnificence of a palace or of a procession; the magnificence of a Roman triumph. (b) Munificence; generosity in a high degree.

Then cometh magnificence, that is to say when a man doth and performeth great works of goodness.

Holland.

Magnificent (mag-ni'fi-sent), a. [L. magnificēns—magnus, great, and facio, to do or make.] 1. Grand in appearance; splendid.

Man he made, and for him built Magnificent this world. Milton.

2. Fond of splendour; showy; stately. Sir

P. Sidney.—3. † Munificent; generous; open-handed.

Every amorous person becometh liberal and magnificent, although he had been aforetime a pinching snudge. Holland.

Magnificently (mag-nif-i-sent-li), adv. In a magnificent manner; with magnificence; with splendour of appearance or pomp of show.

Magnifico (mag-nif-i-kō), n. 1. A grandee of Venice.

But if the peers have ceased to be magnificos, may it not also appear that the Sovereign may cease to be a Doge? Disraeli.

2. A rector of a German university.

Magnifier (mag-ni-fi-ēr), n. One who or that which magnifies: (a) that which enlarges or increases apparent size; specifically, an optical instrument that magnifies; a convex lens, a concave mirror, or a combination of lenses or mirrors, which increases the apparent magnitude of bodies. (b) One who extols or exalts.

Magnify (mag-ni-fi), v. t. pret. & pp. magnified; ppr. magnifying. [L. magnifico—magnus, great, and facio, to make.] 1. To make great or greater; to increase the apparent dimensions of; to enlarge; to augment; as, a convex lens magnifies the bulk of a body to the eye.—2. To increase the power or glory of; to sound the praises of; to extol; to exalt.

O, magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his name together. Ps. xxxiv. 3.

Thou that day
Thy thunders magnified. Milton.

3. To represent as greater than reality; to exaggerate.—SYN. To enlarge, amplify, augment, exaggerate, exalt, extol, praise, glorify.

Magnify (mag-ni-fi), v. i. 1. To possess the quality of causing objects to appear larger than reality; to increase the apparent dimensions of objects; as, my spectacles magnify too much.—2. To have effect; to avail; to signify. [Old vulgarism.]

My governess assured my father I had wanted for nothing; that I was almost eaten up with the green-sickness; but this magnified but little with my father. Spectator.

—Magnifying glass, in optics, a plano-convex or double-convex lens: so called because objects seen through it have their apparent dimensions increased.

Magniloquence (mag-nil'o-kwens), n. [L. magniloquentia—magnus, great, and loquens, speaking.] A lofty manner of speaking or writing; tumid, pompous words or style; language expressive of pretensions greater than realities warrant; grandiloquence; bombast.

Magniloquent (mag-nil'o-kwent), a. Big in words; speaking loftily or pompously; expressing lofty pretensions; bombastic; tumid; grandiloquent.

Magniloquently (mag-nil'o-kwent-li), adv. In a magniloquent manner; with loftiness or pomposity of language.

Magniloquous† (mag-nil'o-kwus), a. Magniloquent.

Magnitude (mag-ni-tūd), n. [L. magnitudo, from magnus, great.] 1. The comparative greatness of anything that can be said to be greater or smaller; the comparative extent, bulk, size, quantity, or amount of anything that can be measured; as, the magnitude of an object, of a surface, of a line, of an angle, of a weight or force of any kind, of an interval of time.—2. Anything that can be measured; any quantity that can be expressed in terms of a quantity of the same kind taken as a unit; specifically, in geom. that which has one or more of the three dimensions, length, breadth, and thickness. An angle is also a kind of geometrical magnitude. Time, weight, and numbers are arithmetical magnitudes.—3. Greatness, as referred to an intellectual or moral standard; grandeur.

With plain heroic magnitude of mind. Milton.

4. Importance; consequence; as, in affairs of magnitude disdain not to take counsel.—Apparent magnitude of an object, that which is measured by the optic or visual angle intercepted between lines drawn from its extremes to the centre of the pupil of the eye. This angle may be considered to be inversely as the distance of the object. [This term is chiefly used when speaking of the heavenly bodies, but is also used in many branches of optical science.]—Magnitude of stars. See STAR.

Magnolia (mag-nō'li-a), n. [After Pierre Magnol, professor of botany at Montpellier in the seventeenth century.] A genus of trees and shrubs, the type of the nat. order Magnoliaceæ. The species, which chiefly inhabit North America, Northern India, China, Japan, and other parts of Asia, are trees much admired on account of the elegance of their flowers and foliage, and are in great request in gardens. The bark of the root of M. glauca, or the beaver-tree, is an important tonic. (See BEAVER-TREE.) M. tripetala, or umbrella-tree, has also tonic properties. The cones of M. acuminata yield a spirituous liquor, employed in Virginia in rheumatic affections. M. grandiflora, or big-laurel, and M. conspicua or Yulan, the yulan or Chinese magnolia, grow well in the south of England, and are perhaps the finest of our ornamental trees. The yulan is remarkable in that it flowers in spring before the leaves expand.

Magnoliaceæ (mag-nō'li-ā'se-ē), n. pl. An important nat. order of albuminous polypetalous exogens, allied to the Ranunculaceæ, consisting of bushes and trees, inhabiting the temperate parts of both the Old and New World. They have alternate minutely dotted leaves, and large solitary flowers; the bark is aromatic and bitter. Several species are valuable for their timber, others for the febrifugal qualities of their bark. (See MAGNOLIA.) Most of them are prized for the beauty of their flowers and foliage. The bark of the tulip-tree (Liriodendron tulipiferum) is said to equal Peruvian bark. Drumys Winteri yields Winter's bark. Ilicium anisatum is called star-anise from its flavour and the starlike arrangement of its carpels. See STAR-ANISE.

Magnum (mag-num), n. [L., large.] A bottle holding two English quarts.

The approbation of much more rational tempers than the B. club could have mustered even before the discussion of the first magnum. Sir W. Scott.

Magnum-bonum (mag-num-bō-num), n. [L., lit. large-good.] 1. The name applied to a large-sized oval plum having a yellow skin covered with a thin whitish bloom.—2. A kind of large-sized barrel pen.

Magot (mag'ot), n. [Fr.] The Barbary ape (Macacus inuus or inuus ecaudatus), which has a small tubercle in place of a tail. It is naturalized on the rock of Gibraltar, and forms the type of Cuvier's genus Inuus. It is remarkable for docility and attachment to its young.

Magot-pie,† Maggot-piet (mag'ot-pi), n. [Magot, magpie, a form of Margaret, and pie, like Fr. margot, a pie, a dim. form of Marguerite.] A magpie.

Augurs, and understood relations have
By magot-pies, and crouches, and rooks, brought
The secret'st man of blood. Shak.

Magpie (mag'pi), n. [Mag, for Margaret, and pie, a magpie, from L. pica, a pie or magpie. Called also magot-pie, maggoty-pie, maggatapie. Comp. O. E. Madge-howlie, an owl; Jenny-wren, Robin-redbreast, &c. See MAGOT-PIE.] 1. A well-known bird, the Magpie (Pica caudata).

Pica caudata, type of the genus Pica, belonging to the Corvidæ or crow family. It is about 13 inches in length; the plumage is black and white, the black glossed with green and purple; the bill is stout, and the tail is very long, whence its specific name caudata. The magpies continue in pairs throughout the year, and prey on a variety of food, chiefly animal. They are celebrated for their crafty instincts, their power of imitating words, and their propensity to purloin and secrete glittering articles.—2. A halfpenny. [Slang.]

I'm at low water-mark—only one bob and a mag-pie. Dickens.

3. In volunteers' slang, a shot striking the target in the division next the outermost in a target divided into four sections: so called because the markers indicate this hit by means of a black and white disk.

Magpie-moth (mag'pi-moth), n. Lerene grossulariata (Linn.), a moth belonging to the family Geometridæ, and often called the Gooseberry-moth. Its colour is white with black and orange spots, and the same colours appear on it in its larval and pupal states. The larva feeds on currant and gooseberry leaves, and where abundant is very destructive.

Magsman (magz'man), n. A street swindler who preys on countrymen and others easily duped. [Slang.]

Magney (ma-gwā' or mag'wā), n. [Mexican maguer.] A species of Agave (A. americana), American aloe, belonging to the nat. order Amaryllidaceæ. It is a native of Mexico, and furnished the natives with a material for their buildings. Its leaves were used for covering the roofs of their houses, and for paper, clothing, and cordage; also for preparing a spirituous liquor called pulque. See AGAVE.

Magus (mā'gus), n. [L. See MAGE.] A Magian; one of the Magi or ancient oriental philosophers.

Magyar (mag'yār; Hung. pron. mād'yār), n. 1. One of an Asiatic race which invaded Hungary about the end of the ninth century, and settled there, where it still forms the predominant race.—2. The native tongue of Hungary. It belongs to the Ugrian family of the Turanian or agglutinate class of tongues.

Mahābhārata (ma-hā-bhā'ra-ta), n. [Skr. mahat, mahā, great, and Bhārata, the descendants of a king named Bharata. Lit. the great history of the descendants of Bharata.] The name of one of the two great epic poems of ancient India, the other being the Rāmāyana. It is founded on, and contains a history of, the contest for supremacy between the two great regal families of North India—the Pāndavas and Kurus or Kauravas—ending in the victory of the former, and in the establishment of their rule over the northern part of India. In reality, however, this narrative occupies but a fourth of the poem, the other three-fourths being episodic and added at various times. The Mahābhārata thus became a sort of encyclopedia, embracing everything which it concerned a cultivated Hindu to know.

Mahadeva (ma-hā-dē'va), n. [Skr. mahā, mahat, great, and deva, god; lit. the great god.] A name of Siva, one of the Indian deities, from which the sacred Ganges is fabled to have sprung.

Mahaleb (ma-hā'leb), n. [Ar. mahaleb.] A species of cherry (Cerasus Mahaleb), nat. order Rosaceæ, sub-order Drupaceæ, whose fruit affords a violet dye and a fermented liquor like kirsch-wasser. It is found in the middle and south of Europe. Its flowers and leaves are used by perfumers, and its wood by cabinet-makers.

Maize (māz), n. [Sp. maiz, from Haytian mahiz, the native name of the plant.] Indian corn, a genus of plants commonly cultivated in the warmer parts of the world, where it answers a purpose similar to that of wheat in more northern countries. The common maize or Indian corn is the Zea

Mays of botanists, a monœcious grass, of vigorous growth, with stems not more than 2 feet high in some varieties, and reaching the height of 8 or even 10 feet in others. The grains are large, compressed, and packed closely in regular parallel rows along the sides of a receptacle many inches long. In large varieties the ear or cob is often 1 foot long and 2 or 3 inches in thickness. Maize is extensively cultivated in America, where it forms almost the only bread eaten by many of the people. Its flour, though exceedingly nourishing, is not glutinous, and must accordingly be mixed with wheat, rye, or other flour before it can be baked. In America large quantities of unripe grains are roasted till they split, and are then eaten under the name of popcorn. From the green stems a syrup is expressed, which is fermented and converted into a kind of spirits. Paper has been made from maize fibres. It is also cultivated throughout a great part of Asia and Africa, and in several countries of the south of Europe, as Spain and Italy. The green stems and leaves form nutritious food for cattle, and in this country it is sown and cut green for this purpose. Z. Cuvacqua, a smaller species, is the Chili maize or Valparaiso corn.

Maizena (māz-ē'na), n. A trade-mark name of a brand of ground corn-starch.

Malic (māl'ik), a. [L. malum, an apple.] Pertaining to apples; obtained from the juice of apples.—Malic acid (C₆H₆O₆), a bibasic acid found in many fruits, particularly in the apple, hence the name. It is most easily obtained from the fruit of Pyrus Aucuparia (mountain-ash or rowan-tree), immediately after it has turned red, but while still unripe. It is very soluble in water, and has a pleasant acid taste.

Malice (mal'is), n. [Fr. malice, L. malitia, from malus, evil; cog. Gr. melas, black; Skr. malam, filth; Ir. maile, evil; Corn malan, the devil.] 1. Enmity of heart; a disposition to injure others without cause, from mere personal gratification, or from a spirit of revenge; unprovoked malignity or spite; ill-will.

Speak of me as I am; nothing extenuate

Nor set down aught in malice. Shak.

2. In law, a formed design or intention of doing mischief to another, called also malice prepense or aforethought. It is expressed when the formed design is evidenced by certain circumstances, discovering such intention; and implied when the act is done in such a deliberate manner that the law presumes malice, though no particular enmity can be proved.—3. A malicious person.

Hag-seed, hence!

Fetch us in fuel; and be quick, thou'rt best,
To answer other business. Shrugg't thou, malice†

SYN. Ill-will, malevolence, enmity, hate, spite, bitterness, malignity, maliciousness, rancour.—Malice, Malevolence, Malignity, Malice is a deeper and more abiding feeling than malevolence, more characteristic of the disposition of a person, and more likely to make itself seen in action. Malevolence is of a more casual and temporary character, and may often be excited by real or fancied wrongs; it is rather characterized by the desire that evil should happen to another than with an intention to bring it about. Malignity is the spirit of malice intensified, a disposition to bring about evil and mischief from an innate love of doing harm to others.

Malice† (mal'is), v. t. To regard with extreme ill-will; to bear extreme ill-will to.

Offending none, and doing good to all,

Yet being malice† both of great and small. Spenser.

Oph. What means this, my lord?

Ham. Marry, this is mitching malicho. Shak.

Malicious (ma-lī'shus), a. [L. malitiosus, from malitia, wickedness. See MALICE.] 1. Indulging or exercising malice; harbouring ill-will or enmity without provocation; malevolent in the extreme; malignant in heart.

I grant him bloody,

Luxurious, avaricious, false, deceitful,

Sudden, malicious, smacking of every sin

That has a name. Shak.

2. Proceeding from extreme hatred or ill-will; dictated by malice; as, a malicious report.—Malicious abandonment, in law, the desertion of a spouse without just cause.—Malicious mischief, in law, the committing of an injury to public or private property, not for the purposes of theft, but from sheer wantonness or malice. This offence is punishable with great severity. In some instances it is a felony, in others a misdemeanour; punishable in some on summary conviction. Intent is the material ingredient in offences of this nature, but as the law presumes malice in the very commission of the act, it lies on the party indicted to rebut the presumption of malice or sufficiently explain the act.—Malicious prosecution, a prosecution preferred maliciously without reasonable cause. From want of probable cause malice may be inferred.—SYN. Ill-disposed, evil-minded, mischievous, malevolent, spiteful, resentful, bitter, malignant, rancorous.

Maliciously (ma-lī'shus-li), adv. In a malicious manner; with malice, enmity, or ill-will.

Proud tyrants who maliciously destroy,

And ride o'er ruins with malignant joy. Somerville.

Malurus (ma-lú'rus), n. [Gr. malos, soft, and oura, a tail.] A genus of insectorial birds belonging to the family Sylviadæ, abundantly dispersed through New South Wales. M. cyaneus is named by the colonists the Superb Warbler, Blue Wren, &c. It is a very beautiful bird.

Malva (mal'va), n. [See MALLOW.] A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Malvaceæ, of which it is the type; the mallows. There are about sixteen species, natives of Europe, temperate Asia, and North Africa, some of them widely spread weeds of cultivation. They are hairy or smooth herbs, with lobed angular or dissected leaves, and axillary solitary or fasciated flowers; the petals are notched, purplish rose-coloured or white. M. sylvestris (the common mallow) is a common and widely diffused species, possessed of mucilaginous properties. The whole plant is used officinally in Britain in fomentations, cataplasms, and emollient enemata.

When fresh the flowers are reddish-purple, but on drying become blue, and yield their colouring principle both to water and alcohol. The alcoholic tincture furnishes one of the most delicate of re-agents for testing the presence of alkalies or acids.

Malvaceæ (mal-vá'sé-è), n. pl. A large natural order of exogenous plants, the distinguishing marks of which are, polypetalous flowers, Common Mallow (Malva sylvestris).

monadelphous stamens, unilocular anthers, valvate aestivation, and often an external calyx (epicalyx) or involucre. A large proportion of the order consists of herbaceous or annual plants, inhabiting all the milder parts of the world, but found most plentifully in hot countries. Several species are of essential service to man. As emollients they are well known in medical practice. The hairy covering of the seeds of the various species of Gossypium forms raw cotton. The inner bark of many species yields fibre of considerable value. Many species of Althæa, Sida, and Hibiscus are splendid flowering plants. See MALVA.

Malvaceous (mal-vá'shus), a. [L. malva, mallows.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling mallows; a term designating a group of plants of which mallows is the type.

Malversation (mal-vér-sá'shon), n. [Fr. malversation—L. male, badly, ill, and versor, to turn one's self about in a place, to occupy one's self, freq. from verto, versum, to turn.] Evil conduct; improper or wicked behaviour; mean artifices or fraudulent tricks; especially, misbehaviour in an office or employment, as fraud, breach of trust, extortion, &c.

Malvesie, † n. Malmsey-wine. Chaucer.

Mam (mam), n. [Contr. from mamma.] Mamma.

Mama, Mamma (ma-má'), n. ['A word composed of a repetition of one of the earliest articulations of the human voice, ma, ma, and hence applied to the objects of earliest interest to the infant, the mother and the mother's breast.' Wedgwood. Comp. L. mamma, the breast; Gr. mamma, mammē, mother; Fr. maman, Sp. mama, G. mama, mamma, and similar words in many languages. See PAPA.] Mother: a word of tenderness and familiarity, used chiefly by young persons.

Mamaluks, Mamelukes (mam'a-lúk, mam'-e-lúk), n. [Ar. mamlik, that which is possessed, a slave, from malak, to possess.] One of the former mounted soldiery of Egypt, consisting originally of Circassian slaves of the boys, introduced in the thirteenth century. So early as 1254 they became so powerful that they made one of their own number sultan, their dynasty continuing till 1517, when it was overthrown by Selim I. Their power, however, remained so great that they continued to be virtual masters of the country. In 1811 the new pasha (afterwards viceroy) of Egypt, Mehemet Ali, having invited the chief Mamelukes, pretending to grace his investiture, into the citadel of Cairo, caused them to be butchered, to the number of 470, which was followed by a general massacre of them throughout Egypt. Some hundreds who escaped into Lower Nubia, built a town, and endeavoured to keep up their force by disciplining negroes. In this they did not succeed, and shortly afterwards dispersed. Written also Mamlouk, Memlook.

Mamelon (mam'e-lon), n. [Fr., a nipple, from L. mamma, a breast.] A small hill or mound with a round top, so called from its resemblance to a woman's breast; a hemispherical elevation. 'Our tents were pitched on another mamelon.' W. H. Russell.

Mamma (mam'ma), n. pl. Mammæ (mam'-mé). [L. See MAMA.] The breast; the organ in females that secretes the milk.

Mammal (mam'mal), n. An animal belonging to the class Mammalia (which see).

Mammalia (mam-mā'li-a), n. pl. [Lit. breast-animals, from L. mamma, the female breast.] The highest class in the animal kingdom, whose distinctive characteristic is that the female suckles the young on a secretion, peculiar to the class, furnished by the mammary glands of the mother, and known as milk. The skin of mammals is always more or less covered with hair, the only apparent exceptions being the whale and the scaled edentates. The blood is warm, and the mode of reproduction viviparous. The heart consists of four chambers or cavities, two auricles and two ventricles, the right auricle and ventricle being connected with the venous system, the left with the arterial. The organs of respiration are the lungs. Respiration is carried on partly by the action of muscles attached to the ribs, but chiefly by means of the diaphragm or midriff, which is a strong muscular partition separating the cavity of the thorax from the abdomen. The skull articulates with the vertebral column by two condyles on the occipital bone; and the lower jaw, which consists of two branches united at the chin, articulates with the skull without the intervention of a quadrate bone. The embryo is invariably enveloped in an amnion, and an allantois is never wanting. The allantois, however, either disappears at an early period of life, or it develops the structure known as the placenta, in accordance with the presence or absence of which the Mammalia are divided into two great sections or sub-classes—implacental mammals, or mammals having no placenta; and placental mammals, or mammals furnished with a placenta. The placental mammals comprise only two orders, the Monotremata and the Marsupialia.

Mammalian (mam-mā'li-an), a. Pertaining to the mammals.

Mammaliferous (mam-ma-lif'ér-us), a. [L. mammalia, and fero, to produce.] In geol. containing mammiferous remains; said of certain strata; as, the mammaliferous crag of Norfolk, &c.

Mammalogist (mam-mal'o-jist), n. One who treats of mammiferous animals or the mammalia.

Mammalogy (mam-mal'o-ji), n. [From E. mammal, and Gr. logos, discourse.] The science or doctrine of mammals or mammiferous animals.

Mammary (mam'ma-ri), a. [L. mamma, the breast.] Pertaining to the breasts or paps; as, the mammary glands, arteries, and veins.

Mammea (mam-mé'a), n. [From mamey, the native Haytian name.] A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Guttiferae. M. americana (the American mammee-tree) is the principal species of this genus, and forms a handsome tree, with a spreading elegant head. The fruit is large, and is considered nourishing and pectoral, and is much esteemed in America. The seeds, which are large, are used as anthelmintics, and a gum distilled from the bark is used to destroy chigoes.

Mammeated (mam-mé-át-ed), a. Having breasts or paps. [Rare.]

Mammea (mam-mé'), n. The Mammea americana or its fruit. See MAMMEA.

Mammee-Sapota (mam-mé'sa-pó'ta), n.

Mammee-Sapota (Lucuma mammosum).

A large tree (Lucuma mammosum), a native of the West Indies and tropical America, where it is cultivated for the sake of its fruit, which is called natural marmalade on account of its containing a thick agreeably-flavoured pulp having somewhat the taste and appearance of quince marmalade. This fruit is pretty nearly egg-shaped, 3 to 5 inches long, covered with a rusty-coloured skin, and contains usually a single hard seed.

Mammelière (mam-mel-yär), n. [Fr. mamelière, from mamelle, L. mamilla, dim. of mamma, a breast.] In anc. armour, one of two circular plates fastened to the surcoat right above the breasts of a knight. To these plates the helmet, sword, or dagger was secured by a chain to prevent its loss by a sudden blow or otherwise.

Mammer† (mam'mér), v. t. [Probably originally signifying to stammer in speaking, and formed (as Nares thinks) from the infantile sound mam, mam.] To hesitate; to stand muttering and in doubt.

I wonder in my soul,
What you would ask me, that I should deny.
Or stand so mammering on. Shak.

Mammet† (mam'met), n. [See MAMMET.] A puppet; a figure dressed; a doll.

This is no world

To play with mammets and to tilt with lips. Shak.

Mammetry† (mam'met-ri), n. [Contr. for Mahometry.] Mohammedanism.

Mammie, Mammy (mam'mi), n. [A form of mamma.] A child's term for mother. [Scotch.]

And ay she wrought her mammie's wark,
And ay she sang sae merrilie. Burns.

Mammifer (mam'mi-fér), n. [L. mamma, the breast, and fero, to bear.] An animal which has breasts for nourishing its young; a mammal. See MAMMAL.

Mammiferous (mam-mif'ér-us), a. Having the distinguishing characteristics of a mammifer; having breasts and nourishing the young by the milk secreted by them.

Mammiform (mam'mi-form), a. [L. mamma, a breast, and forma, shape.] Having the shape or form of paps.

Mamilla (mam-mil-la), n. [L. mamilla, a little breast, from mamma, the breast.] A little breast; specifically, in anat. one of the conical bodies of the kidneys, at the point where the urine escapes.

Mammillary (mam'mil-a-ri), a. [L. mamilla.] 1. Pertaining to the paps; resembling - pap; an epithet applied to two small protuberances, like nipples, found under the fore ventricles of the brain, and to a process of the temporal bone.—2. In mineral, studded with mammiform protuberances: a term applied to minerals composed of convex concretions, in form somewhat resembling breasts.

Mammillary (mam'mil-a-ri), n. In geol. ground studded with rounded breast-shaped projections.

Mammillate (mam'mil-át), a. In entom. a term applied to the palp of an insect in which the last joint is smaller than the preceding, and retractile within it.

Mammillated (mam'mil-át-ed), a. Having small nipples, or little protuberances like nipples; specifically, (a) in mineral, a term applied to certain appearances observed in minerals, resembling small bubbles or rounded protuberances; as, flint containing chalcedony is generally mammillated. (b) In conch. a term applied to a shell whose apex is rounded like a teat.

Mammillation (mam-mil-á'shon), n. In pathol. a small prominence on a mucous surface, as of the stomach.

Mammilloid (mam'mil-oid), a. [L. mamilla, pap, or nipple. Owen.] Shaped like a pap or nipple.

Mammoth (mam'mok), n. [Perhaps a dim. of Gael. mam, a large round hill, also a handful (comp. hillock from hill); or, as Wedgwood thinks, from mamble or numble, the word in East Anglia meaning fragments left after eating, leavings.] A shapeless piece. [Obsolete or provincial English.]

Mammoth† (mam'mok), v. t. To tear in pieces.

Mammelières.

The surfeited priest scruples not to paw and mam-mock the sacramental bread. Milton.

Mammodis (mam'mó-dis), n. [Hind. mah-mádt, a kind of fine muslin.] Coarse plain India muslins.

Mammon (mam'mon), n. [L. mammona; Gr. mammonas, mammon, riches, from Chal. mammon, mámón, Heb. matmón, a place where something is hid, a treasury, útmán, to hide.] 1. The Syrian god of riches, mentioned in the New Testament as a personification of worldliness.

Mammon, the least erected spirit that fell
From heaven; for even in heaven his looks and thoughts
Were always downward bent, admiring more
The riches of heaven's pavement, trodden gold,
Than aught divine or holy. Milton.

2. Riches; wealth.

If, therefore, ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches? Luke xvi. 11.

Mammonish (mam'mon-ish), a. Devoted to the service of Mammon or the pursuit of riches; actuated by a spirit of mammonism or of money-getting.

A great, black, devouring, world, not Christian but Mammonish, Devilish. Carlyle.

Mammonism (mam'mon-izm), n. Devotion to the service of Mammon or the pursuit of wealth.

Mammonist (mam'mon-ist), n. A person devoted to the acquisition of wealth; one whose affections are placed supremely on riches; a worldling.

I am none of those mammonists who adore white and red earth, and make their prince's picture their idol that way. Hawth.

Mammonite (mam'mon-it), n. A mammonist.

When a Mammonite smother kills her babe for a burial fee,
And Timour-Mammon grins on a pile of children's bones,
Is it peace or war? better war! Tennyson.

Mammonization (mam'mon-iz-á'shon), n. Act or process of rendering mammonish or devoted to the pursuit of wealth; the state of being under the influence or actuated by the spirit of mammonism.

Mammosé (mam'mós), a. [L. mamma, a breast.] Having the form of a breast; breast-shaped. [Rare.]

Mammoth (mam'moth), n. [Rus. mamant, mamont, from Tart. mamma, the earth, because the remains of these animals being found embedded in the earth the natives believed that they burrowed like moles.] An extinct species of elephant, Elephas primigenius. It was thickly covered with hair of three sorts, one of these stiff like bristles a foot in length, another coarse flexible hair, and the third a kind of wool. This warm covering enabled it to endure the cold of its native regions. This species differs from the living elephants in the shape of the enamel plates of its grinders, in its large curved tusks, and shaggy hair. The bones and tusks of the mammoth have been found in great abundance in Siberia; they have also been found in Yorkshire. An entire carcass which had been preserved in the ice and latterly thawed out, was discovered towards the close of last century on the banks of the river Lena, in Siberia, in such a perfect state that its flesh was eaten by dogs, wolves, and bears. It was 9 feet high and about 16 feet in length; the tusks were 9 feet long, measuring along the curve. This is the only instance of a fossil animal preserved entire.

Mammoth (mam'moth), a. Resembling the mammoth in size; very large; gigantic; as, a mammoth ox.

Mammothrept (mam'mó-thrept), n. [Gr. mammothreptos—mamma, a mother, a grandmother, and trephō, to nourish.] A child brought up by its grandmother; a spoiled child. [Rare.]

O, you are a mere mammothrept in judgment. B. Jonson.

Mammoth-tree (mam'moth-tré), n. The Wellingtonia gigantea, the only known species of the genus Wellingtonia, nat. order Coniferae. It is the largest of all pines, and the largest tree of temperate climates. Some botanists refer it to the genus Sequoia, under the name of S. gigantea.

Man (man), n. pl. Men (men). [A. Sax. man, mann, mon, a person, a human being, whether man, woman, or child; D. O.H.G. Sw. and Goth. man, G. mann, Icel. manthr, ch, chain; ch, Sc. loch; g, go; j, job;

h, Fr. ton; ng, sing; th, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

mannr, Dan. mand; supposed to be from a root man, meaning to think, seen unchanged in Skr. man, to think, to know, in manas, mind, manushya, a man, and also in E. mean, to intend, mind, G. minne, love, L. mens, the mind, memini, to remember, &c. In English there is only one word for man and human being (L. vir and homo), but other Teutonic languages have two, as D. man and mensch, G. mann and mensch, Dan. mand and menneske, the latter being properly adjectives. The pl. men is parallel to feet, the change of a and o to e being the result of i-umlaut (manni giving men, föti, fēt, feet). 1. An individual of the human race; a human being; a person; as, no man is infallible.

A man in an instant may discover the assertion to be impossible. Dr. H. More.

2. Particularly, a male adult of the human race, as distinguished from a woman or a boy.

Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man. 1 Cor. xi. 9.

The nurse's legends are for truths received, And the man dreams but what the boy believed. Dryden.

3. The human race; mankind; the totality of human beings: used without article or plural; as, man is born to trouble. Blumenbach divides mankind into five varieties:—(1) Caucasian variety, having the skin white. (2) The Mongolian variety, of an olive colour. (3) The Ethiopian variety, the skin and eyes black. (4) The American variety, the skin dark, and more or less of a red tint. (5) The Malay variety, the colour varying from a light tawny to a deep brown. Professor Huxley has divided man into five groups—Australoid, Negroid, Mongoloid, and the Xanthochroic and Melanochroic (fair and dark whites). The Australoid group includes the indigenous non-Aryan tribes of Central and Southern India, the ancient Egyptians and their descendants the modern Fellahs. In the Negroid he includes both the Negroes proper and the Bushmen of the extreme south, the Hottentots being considered a cross-breed between these. The Mongoloid includes the Tatar races, the Chinese and Japanese. The nations described as 'Caucasian' he breaks up into two groups—the Xanthochroic, or fair whites, of which the Teutonic and Scandinavian races may be regarded as the type; and the Melanochroic, or dark whites, which he is disposed to consider as sprung from intermixture of Xanthochroi and Australoids. The Hindus, Arabs, and the dark-haired inhabitants of Southern Europe belong to this division. In the above classification many races, as the American Indians, natives of Australia, New Zealand, &c., appear to be left out of account.—4. A male who possesses in a remarkable degree the characteristics of manhood, as manly strength or virtue.

I dare do all that may become a man; Who dares do more is none. Shak.

5. A male servant or attendant; an adult male in some person's employment or under his direction; a workman; an employee. 'Like master, like man.' Old proverb.

I and my man will presently go ride. Cowley.

6. A vassal, liege, subject, or tenant: with possessives.

The vassal or tenant, kneeling, ungirt, uncovered, and holding up his hands between those of his lord, professed that he did become his man from that day forth, of life, limb, and earthly honour. Blackstone.

7. A husband.

Every wife ought to answer for her man. Addison.

8. A word of familiar address, often implying some degree of impatience and disparagement.

We speak no treason, man. Shak.

9. A piece with which a game, as chess or draughts, is played.—Man of straw, a man of no substantial character, influence, or means; a puppet at the will of another; a person destitute of capital put forward by way of decoy. See extract.

It used to be customary for a number of worthless fellows to loiter about our law-courts, to become false-witness or surety for any one who would buy their services; their badge was a straw in their shoes. Being utterly penniless and without principle, a man of straw became proverbial. Brewer.

—Man is used in a few compounds merely to denote the sex, as in man-child, man-servant. It is also used in a great many other compounds whose meanings are sufficiently obvious; as, man-eater, man-hater, man-pleaser, man-slayer, &c.

Man (man), v. t. pret. & pp. manned; ppr. manning. 1. To supply with men; to furnish with a sufficient force or complement of men, as for management, service, defence, or the like; as, to man the lines of a fort or fortress; to man a ship or a boat; to man the capstan.

2. To furnish with strength for action; to strengthen; to fortify.

Theodosius having manned his soul with pious reflections. Addison.

3. To furnish with attendants or servants. [Rare.]—4. To point; to aim.

Man but a rush against Othello's breast, And he retires. Shak.

5. To accustom to man; to tame, as a hawk.

Another way I have to man my haggard, To make her come and know her keeper's call. Shak.

—To man the yards (naut.), to send a sufficient number of men upon the yards to reef or furl the sails; also, to range men in a standing position along the tops of the yards as a mark of respect to any person, or on some memorable occasion.

Manning the Yards.

ent number of men upon the yards to reef or furl the sails; also, to range men in a standing position along the tops of the yards as a mark of respect to any person, or on some memorable occasion.

Manable (man'a-bl), a. Of age for a husband; marriageable. 'She's manable, is she not?' Beau. & Fl.

Manace, n. v. t. Same as Menace.

Manacle (man'a-kl), n. [Fr. manicula, L. manicula, dim. of manica, the long sleeve of a tunic, a handcuff or manacle, from manus, the hand.] An instrument of iron for fastening the hands; handcuffs; shackles: generally used in the plural.

Manacle (man'a-kl), v. t. pret. & pp. manacled; ppr. manaching. To put handcuffs or other fastening upon, in order to confine the hands; to shackle; to confine; to restrain the use of the limbs or natural powers of.

Is it thus you use this monarch, to manacle and shackle him hand and foot? Arbuthnot.

Manage (man'aj), v. t. pret. & pp. managed; ppr. managing. [Under this form two words have become blended together, first, O.E. menage, Fr. manège, the training or management of a horse, also management or guidance in general, It. maneggiare, to handle, to manage, from L. manus, the hand; and second, Fr. ménage, a household, ménager, to husband or make the most of; the latter is derived from L. mansio, a dwelling, through L.L. mansionaticum, mansuetum.] 1. Mandragora (man-drag'o-ra), n. [L. and Gr. mandragoras.] 1. A genus of herbaceous perennials, popularly called mandrakes, native of the Mediterranean region, having large thick roots, with large stalked undulate root-leaves. The short flower-stalks rise often many together from among the leaves, bearing rather large pale-purple or whitish blossoms with netted veins. They have poisonous properties, and act as emetics, purgatives, and narcotics. See MANDRAKE. — 2. A medical preparation obtained from the mandrake.

Not poppy, nor mandragora, Nor all the drowsy syrups of the world, Shall ever medicine thee to that sweet sleep Which thou ow'st yesterday. Shak.

Mandrake (man'drāk), n. [See MANDRAKORA.] The popular name of plants of the genus Mandragora. They belong to the nat. order Solanaceæ, and resemble belladonna in their poisonous properties, but are more narcotic. Aphrodisiac virtues have from time immemorial been ascribed to these plants. The mandrake root, from its occasional resemblance to the lower part of the human body, was formerly supposed to possess an inferior kind of animal life, and the popular belief was that when torn from the ground it uttered such fearful groans that the person who uprooted it went mad.

And shrieks, like mandrakes' torn out of the earth, That living mortals hearing them run mad. Shak.

Mandrel, Mandril (man'drel, man'dril), n. [Fr. mandrin, from Gr. mandra, an inclosed space, the bed in which the stone of a ring is set.] In mach. a straight bar of iron on which an article having a hole through it is fitted to be turned. It is centred between the lathe-spindle and the spindle of the shifting head. The lathe-spindle is also sometimes called the mandril. The name is also given to any straight bar upon which a tube or ring is welded, and to a plug around which metal and glass are cast.

Mandrill (man'dril), n. [Sp. mandril, Fr. mandrille, from the native West African name.] A species of monkey; the great blue-faced or rib-nosed baboon, the Cynocephalus Maimon or Mormon, the largest, most formidable, ferocious, and hideous of all the baboons. The mandrills are natives of the western coast of Africa, where they associate in large troops, which are the terror of the negroes, and are more than a match for the fiercest beast of prey. They often plunder villages and cultivated fields with impunity. See BABOON.

Manducable (man'dü-ka-bl), a. Capable of being manducated or chewed; fit to be eaten.

If tangible by his fingers, why not by his teeth, that is, manducable! Coleridge.

Manducate (man'dü-kät), v.t. pret. & pp. manducated; ppr. manducating. [L. manduco, manducatum, a lengthened form of mando, to chew. Manducare becomes manger in F., whence E. manger.] To masticate; to chew.

It is gravel in the teeth, and a man must drink the blood of his own gums when he manducates such unwholesome, such unpleasant fruit. Jer. Taylor.

Manducation (man'dü-kä'shon), n. [L. manducatio, manducationis, from manduco. See MANDUCATE.] The act of manducating or chewing.

Manettia (ma-net'ti-a), n. [After Xavier Manetti, professor of botany at Florence.] A genus of climbing under-shrubs, natives of tropical America, nat. order Rubiaceæ. The bark of the root of M. cordifolia is emetic, and is regarded in Brazil as a valuable remedy in dropsy and dysentery.

Man-Friday (man-frī'dä), n. [From Friday, the servant of Robinson Crusoe.] A servile follower; a servant of all work.

Manful (man'fül), a. Having the spirit of a man; bold; brave; courageous; noble; honourable.

Nor know I whether I be very base Or very manful, whether very wise Or very foolish. Tennyson.

Manfully (man'fül-i), adv. In a manful manner; boldly; courageously; honourably. 'I slew him manfully in fight.' Shak.

Manfulness (man'fül-nes), n. The quality of being manful; boldness; courageousness.

Mangaby (manga-bi), n. [So called by Buffon from Mangaby in Madagascar, of which he supposed it to be a native.] A name given to a monkey (Cercopithecus fuliginosus) of sooty colour, but with naked white eyelids, and belonging to the group of guenons; the white-eyed monkey. Another member of the group is also sometimes so called.

Manganate, Mangesate (man'gan-ät, man-gan-öz'ät), n. A compound of manganic acid with a base.

Manganese (man'gan-öz), n. [Formed by metathesis from magnesium, the name first given to it by Gahn.] Sym. Mn. At. wt. 55. A metal of a dusky white or whitish-gray colour, very hard and difficult to fuse. Exposed to air it speedily oxidizes; it decomposes water at all temperatures. The common ore of manganese is the dioxide, black oxide, or peroxide (MnO₂), the pyrolusite of mineralogists, a substance largely employed in the preparation of chlorine, for the manufacture of bleaching-powder or chlorate of lime. It is employed in the manufacture of plate-glass, to correct the yellow colour which oxide of iron is apt to impart to the glass. It is also used in making the black enamel of pottery. One of the ores of manganese, black wadd, is remarkable for its spontaneous inflammation when mixed with oil.

Manganesian (man-gan-öz'i-an), a. Pertaining to manganese; consisting of it or partaking of its qualities.

Manganesic (man-gan-öz'ik), a. Same as Manganesian.

Manganesium, Manganium (man-gan-öz'i-um, man-gä-ni-um), n. Manganese (which see).

Manganic (man-gan'ik), a. Obtained from manganese. — Manganic acid, an acid formed from manganese with oxygen. It has not hitherto been obtained in a separate state, but when the hydrate, the carbonate, or the nitrate of potassium is fused with peroxide of manganese, a dark green coloured compound is obtained, long known under the name of chameleon mineral, from the property of its solution to pass rapidly through several shades of colour. This substance has since been termed manganate of potassium (K₂MnO₄).

Manganite (man'gan-it), n. One of the ores of manganese, the hydrated sesquioxide. It is also called Gray Manganese-ore, and is used in the manufacture of glass.

Manganium, n. See MANGANESEUM.

Mangcorn (mang'korn), n. [A. Sax. mengan, to mix, O. or Prov. E. meng, mung (D. and G. mengen, Icel. menga), and corn.] A crop of several species of grain grown together; a mixture of wheat and rye or other species of grain.

Mange (månj), n. [O. Fr. mangeson, Fr. dé-mangeaison, an itching, from démanger, to itch, from manger, L. manduco, to eat. See MANDUCATE. Comp. Sp. comer, to itch, from L. comedere, to eat.] A cutaneous disease very similar to itch in the human subject, and to which horses, cattle, dogs, and other beasts are subject.

Mangel-wurzel (mang'l-wér'z), n. [G., lit. want-root, but the proper form is mangold-wurzel—G. mangold, beet, and wurzel, root = beet-root.] A variety of beet, Beta vulgaris macrorrhiza, extensively cultivated as food for cattle.

Manger (mån'jér), n. [Fr. mangeoire, from manger, L. manduco, manducare, to eat. See MANDUCATE.] 1. A trough or box in which fodder is laid for horses or cattle; the receptacle from which horses or cattle eat in a stable or cow-house.

A churlish cur got into a manger, and there lay growling to keep the horses from their provender. Sir R. L. Estrange.

2. Naut. a space at the fore end of the deck of a ship-of-war, extending abaft of the hawse-holes, and separated from the after-part of the deck by a board (called the manger-board), to prevent the water which enters the hawse-holes from running over the rest of the deck.

Manger-board (mån'jér-bórd), n. The board or bulkhead on a ship's deck that separates the manger from the other part of the deck.

Mangifera (man-jí-fér-a), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Anacardiaceæ. See MANGO.

Mangily (mån'jil), adv. In a mangy or foul manner; meanly.

Oh, this sounds mangily,
Poorly, and scurvily, in a soldier's mouth. Beau. & Fl.

Manginess (mån'jī-nes), n. The quality or condition of being mangy; scabbiness; infection of the mange.

Mangle (mang'gl), v. t. pret. & pp. mangled; ppr. mangling. [Etymology somewhat doubtful. By some derived from L. maneus, maimed, through L. L. mangulare, to mangle. There are also sundry other words with which it might be connected, as A. Sax. be-mancian, to maim; I. G. manik, deficient, mutilated; D. manik, lame; G. mangel, a fault or defect; mangeln, to be wanting; Armor. manik, monk, wanting an arm or hand.] 1. To cut by repeated blows, making a ragged or torn wound, or covering with wounds; to tear in cutting; to cut in a bungling manner; to hack; to lacerate; to disfigure by cutting or hacking; applied chiefly to the cutting of flesh.

And, seized with fear, forgot his mangled meat. Dryden.
2. Fig. to destroy the symmetry or completeness; to take by piecemeal; to mutilate; to mar through malice or bungling; as, to mangle a passage of an author in quotation; to mangle one's reputation.

Mangle (mang'gl), n. [D. and G. mangel, from O. Fr. mangonel, Gr. manganon, the axis of a pulley. See MANGONEL.] A well-known machine for smoothing table-cloths, table-napkins, sheets, and other articles of linen or cotton. As formerly made it consisted of an oblong rectangular wooden chest which rested upon two cylinders. The chest was loaded with stones to make it press with sufficient force upon the cylinders, and was moved backwards and forwards by means of a wheel and pinion, the rollers being thus made to pass over and thoroughly press the articles spread on a polished table underneath. Mangles of this construction have, however, been very much superseded by mangles which act in the manner of a calender, the cloth to be smoothed being passed through between one or more pairs of rollers.

Mangle (mang'gl), v. t. To smooth cloth with a mangle; to calender.

Mangler (mang'glér), n. One who mangles or tears in cutting; one who mars or mutilates.

Mangler (mang'glér), n. One who uses a mangle.

Mango (mang'gō), n. [Malay.] 1. The fruit of the mango-tree (Mangifera indica), nat. order Anacardiaceæ. The genus Mangifera comprises about fourteen species of trees, with alternate stalked entire leaves and numerous small pink or yellowish flowers in much-branched panicles. They are natives of tropical Asia, but the mango-tree is widely cultivated throughout the tropics. Fine varieties produce a luscious, slightly acid fruit much prized for the dessert. The large flat kernel is nutritious, and has been cooked for food in times of scarcity.—2. A green musk-melon pickled.

Mango-bird (mang'gō-bér'd), n. In ornith. the Indian oriole (Oriolus kundoo).

Mango-fish (mang'gō-fish), n. [From its beautiful yellow colour resembling that of a ripe mango, or because it appears at the same time as the mango.] A fish of the Ganges (Polymemus risua), about 15 inches long, and highly esteemed for food. It is of a beautiful yellow colour, and the pectoral fins have some of the rays extended into long threads. It ascends the Ganges in April and May, and is then sought after as a great delicacy.

Mangold-wurzel (mang'gōld-wér'z), n. Same as Mangel-wurzel.

Mangonel (mang'on-el), n. [O. Fr. mangonel, Fr. mangoneau, It. manganello, mangano, from Gr. manganon, a machine for defending fortifications.] An engine formerly used for throwing stones and battering walls.

Mangonism (mang'gon-izm), n. The art of mangonizing or of setting off to advantage. Bvelyn.

Mangonist (mang'gon-ist), n. 1. One who mangonizes or furberishes up worthless articles for sale. Marston.—2. A slave-dealer. 3. A strumpet.

Mangonize (mang'gon-iz), v. t. [L. mangonizo, to ship off, from mango, a dealer who sets off his wares by furberishing them up.] 1. To polish or furberish up for setting off to advantage. B. Jonson.—2. To fatten, as slaves, for sale.

Mangostan (mang'gō-stan), n. Same as Mangosteen.

Mangosteen (mang'gō-stēn), n. [Malay mangusta, mangis.] A tree of the East Indies, Garcinia Mangostana, nat. order Clusiaceæ or Guttiferæ. The tree grows to the height of 18 feet, and the fruit is about the size of an orange, and is one of the most delicious and wholesome of all known fruits. See GARCINIA.

Mango-tree (mang'gō-trē), n. Mangifera indica. See MANGO.

Mangrove (mang'grōv), n. [Malay manggi-manggi.] 1. A tree of the East and West Indies, Rhizophora Mangle, nat. order Rhizophoraceæ. The wood is dark-red, hard, and durable, and the bark is used for tanning.

The fruit is said to be sweet and edible, and the fermented juice is made into a kind of light wine. The seeds of mangrove germinate in the seed-vessel, the root growing downwards till it fixes itself in the mud. The red mangrove (R. Can-deb) is found in the West Indies, where it is used for the cure of fevers, as well as of the bites of venomous insects. The bark is used in dyeing red, and the wood is heavy and takes a fine polish. The white mangrove of Brazil is a species of Avicennia, A. tomentosa, nat. order Verbenaceæ. Its bark is of great use at Rio Janeiro for tanning. The soft part of the bark of the white mangrove is formed into ropes.—2. The mango-fish (which see).

Mangrove-hen (mang'grōv-hen), n. A West Indian bird, a species of rail (Callus longirostris).

Mangy (mån'jī), a. Infected with the mange; scabby.

which a man may creep into a drain, cess-pool, steam-boiler, parts of machinery, &c., for cleaning or repairing.

Manhood (man'hūd), n. 1. The state of being a man: (a) as opposed to a spiritual being, or to one of the lower animals; human nature; humanity.

Equal to the Father as touching his godhead and inferior to the Father as touching his manhood. Athanasian Creed (Com. Præyer).

(b) As opposed to a woman: the opposite of womanhood. (c) As opposed to a boy or child; the state of being an adult male.

And, starting into manhood, scorn the boy. Pope.

2. The qualities of or becoming a man; courage; fortitude; resolution; honour.

No man was spoken of but he for manhood. Sir P. Sidney.
Go thy ways, old Jack; die when thou wilt; if manhood, good manhood, be not forgot upon the face of the earth, then am I a shotten herring. Shak.

Mania (mā'nī-a), n. [L., from Gr.; allied to Gr. menos, the mind; E. mind and man.] Madness; also rage or vehement desire for anything; often used in composition in sense of morbid, uncontrollable desire; as, kleptomania, dipsomania.—Mania a potu, madness from drinking; delirium tremens.

Maniable (mā'nī-a-bl), a. [Fr., from manier, to handle, to manage, from L. manus, the hand.] Manageable; tractable. Bacon.

Maniac (mā'nī-ak), a. [L. maniacus, from mania. See MANIA.] Raving with madness; raging with disordered intellect; mad.

Maniac (mā'nī-ak), n. One raving with madness; a madman.

Maniacal (mā'nī-ak-al), a. Pertaining to or connected with madness.

Manicaria (man-i-kā'ri-a), n. A genus of palms, consisting of a solitary species, found in the tidal swamps of the Lower Amazon river, having the leaves entire, or occasionally irregularly split when old, as distinguished from the other genera, whose leaves are more or less pinnated or fan-shaped. Individual leaves frequently measure 30 feet in length, and 4 or 5 feet in width, and are used by the Indians for roofing their huts.

Manicate (man'ī-kāt), a. [L. manicatus, sleeved, from manica, sleeves, from manus, the hand.] In bot. covered with hairs or pubescence so interwoven into a mass that they form a tissue which can be easily separated from the surface.

Manichean (man-i-kē'an), a. Pertaining to the Manichees or their doctrines.

This consideration may suffice to refute Mr. Mill's strange propensity to favour the Manichean doctrine . . . that there is not one Supreme Being but two principles in active hostility, the one perpetually frustrating the designs of the other. Zénn. Rev.

Manichean, Manichee (man-i-kē'an, man'ī-kē), n. One of a sect in Persia who maintained that there are two supreme principles, the one good, the other evil, which produce all the happiness and calamities of the world. The first principle, or light, they held to be the author of all good; the second, or darkness, the author of all evil. The founder of the sect was Manes or Manichæus, who lived in the third century.

Manichæism (man'ī-kē-izm), n. The doctrines taught or system of principles maintained by the Manicheans.

This hypothesis appears to us to leave Mr. Mill little choice but in Polytheism, Manichæism, or Devil-worship. For if the powers of the Maker of the world are limited, they must be controlled by the superior power of some being greater than himself. There is a plurality, or at least a duality, of these supernatural existences, of which man and nature are at once the creatures and the victims. Edin. Rev.

Manicheist (man'ī-kē-ist), n. Same as Manichean.

Manichord, Manicord (man'ī-kord, man'ī-kor-don), n. [O. Fr. manicordion, Fr. manichordion; It. monacordo; Gr. monochordon—monos, alone, single, and chordē, a string—because originally an instrument with a single string.] A musical instrument in the form of a spinet, whose strings, like those of the clarchord, are covered with little pieces of cloth to deaden and soften their sounds; whence it is called the Dumb Spinnet.

Manicon (man'ī-kon), n. [L., a plant, the juice of which was supposed to produce madness, from Gr. manikos, relating to madness, from mania, madness. See MANIA.] A species of nightshade.

Bewitch hermetic man to run
Stark staring mad with manicon. Hudibras.

Manidæ (man'ī-dē), n. pl. A family of edentate mammals, including only the scaly anteaters or pangolins, found both in Asia and Africa. See MANIS.

Manie, n. [L. mania. See MANIA.] Mania; madness.

Engendered of humours melancholic. Chaucer.

Manifest (man'i-fest), a. [L. manifestus, evident, palpable, that may be laid hold of by the hand—said by some to be compounded of manus, the hand, and root fas, to bind, by others of manus, the hand, and festus, pp. of obs. fendo, to dash against.] 1. Plain; open; clearly visible to the eye or obvious to the understanding; apparent; not obscure or difficult to be seen or understood.

That which may be known of God is manifest in them. Rom. i. 19.

Thus manifest to sight the god appeared. Dryden.

2.† Detected; convicted; with of. [Rare.] Calistho there stood manifest of shame. Dryden.

SYN. Open, clear, apparent, visible, conspicuous, plain, obvious, evident.

Manifest (man'i-fest), n. 1.† A public declaration; an open statement; a manifesto. 2. A document signed by the master of a vessel at the place of lading, to be exhibited at the custom-house, containing a specific description of the ship and her cargo, with the destination of the ship and of each package of the goods, &c.

Manifest (man'i-fest), v.t. [L. manifesto. See the adjective.] 1. To disclose to the eye or to the understanding; to show plainly; to put beyond doubt or question; to display; to exhibit.

There is nothi^g hid, which shall not be manifested. Mark iv. 22.

Thy life did manifest thou lov'dst me not. Shak.

2. In com. to exhibit the manifest or invoice of; to declare at the custom-house; as, to manifest a cargo. SYN. To reveal, show, prove, evidence, exhibit, declare, evince, make known, disclose, display.

Manifestable, Manifestible (man'i-fest-a-bl, man'i-fest-i-bl), a. Capable of being manifested.

There is no other way than this that is manifestible either by Scripture, reason, or experience. Dr. H. More.

Manifestation (man'i-fes-tā'shon), n. [L. manifestatio, manifestationis, from manifesto, to exhibit clearly. See MANIFEST, a.] 1. The act of manifesting or making manifest; a showing forth; a making evident to the eye or to the understanding; display; as, the manifestation of God's power.

The secret manner in which acts of mercy ought to be performed, requires this public manifestation of them at the great day. Atterbury.

2. That by or in which something is made manifest; clear or visible evidence.

Manifesto (man'i-fes'tō), n. [It.; L. manifestus, manifest.] A public declaration, usually of a sovereign or government, making known certain intentions, or proclaiming certain opinions and motives in reference to some act or course of conduct done or contemplated; as, a manifesto declaring an intention to begin war.

Frederick, in a public manifesto, appealed to the Empire against the insolent pretensions of the Pope. Mitman.

Manifold (man'i-fōld), a. [Many and fold.] 1. Numerous and various in kind or quality; many in number; numerous; multiplied.

O Lord, how manifold are thy works! Ps. civ. 24.

I know your manifold transgressions. Amos v. 12.

2. Exhibiting or embracing many points, features, or characteristics; complicated in character; involving many subjects; used with nouns in the singular number; as, the manifold wisdom of God, or his manifold grace. Eph. iii. 10; 1 Pet. iv. 10. 'The manifold use of friendship.' Bacon.

Manifold (man'i-fōld), adv. Many times, or by many times.

There is no man that hath left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children, for the kingdom of God's sake, who shall not receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come life everlasting. Luke xviii. 29, 30.

With superfluous hand
So many nobler bodies to create,
Greater so manifold. Milton.

Manifold (man'i-fōld), v.t. To multiply; specifically, to multiply impressions of, as a letter, by means of a manifold-writer.

Manifold (man'i-fōld), n. A copy made by a manifold-writer.

The scarfs and the banners about thee did manifoldly dissuade me from believing thee a vessel too great a burden. Shak.

Manifoldness (man'i-fōld-nes), n. State of being manifold; multiplicity.

Manifold-writer (man'i-fōld-rit-ēr), n. A writing apparatus for taking several copies of a letter or document at once by a stylus, upon thin tissue or tracing paper interleaved with black oiled sheets, the strokes of the stylus causing markings to be simultaneously transferred to each sheet of thin paper.

Maniform (man'i-form), a. [L. manus, the hand, and forma, shape.] Shaped like the hand.

Maniglion (ma-nil'yōn), n. [It. maniglio, a handle. See MANILLO.] In gun. one of two handles on the back of a piece of ordnance.

Manihot, Manihoc (man'i-hot, man'i-hok), n. See MANIOC.

Manikin (man'i-kin), n. [Man, and dim. ending -ikin, -kin. Comp. bootikin, lamb-kin, &c.] 1. A little man; a dwarf; a pigmy. 2. An artificial anatomical preparation, made with pasteboard, plaster, &c., exhibiting all parts of the body, upon which surgeons practise the application of bandages, &c. Called also a Phantom.

Manil, Manilla (man'il, ma-nil'la), n. Same as Manillo.

Manillo (ma-nil'i-ō), n. [It. maniglio, a bracelet, a handle (see MANIGLION), dim. derived from L. manus, the hand.] 1. A ring or bracelet worn in Africa as an ornament for the arm or leg.

Their arms and legs chained with manillos or voluntary bracelets. Sir T. Herbert.

Manioc (man'i-ok), n. [Pg. and Brazil, mandioca.] An American plant of the genus Manihot, nat. order Euphorbiaceae. The genus consists of woody or shrubby plants with fleshy tuberous roots, palmately divided leaves, and axillary or terminal panicles of dioecious flowers. From the fleshy tubers of M. utilisissima tapioca and cassava are prepared. See CASSAVA and TAPIOCA.

Maniple (man'i-pl), n. [L. manipulus, manipulus, a handful, a company of soldiers—manus, the hand, and ple, root of plenus, full.] 1. A handful. 'Maniples of papers.' B. Jonson.—2. In Rom. antiq. a company of soldiers consisting of sixty common soldiers, two centurions, and a standard-bearer.

The very maniples forsooth are to break ranks without orders. Bentley.

3. In the Roman Catholic and some other Episcopal churches, one of the sacred vestments assumed by a bishop after the Confe-tor in the mass, and by a priest after the stole and before the chasuble. Originally, the maniple was nothing more than a strip of fine linen, attached to the left arm, for the purpose of wiping the chalice previous to the first oblation. It afterwards came to be enriched with embroidery, like the stole, and finally became merely an ornament worn by the priest and his assistants above the left wrist at the celebration of the eucharist. It is now of the same width and colour as the stole and the vestment or chasuble, fringed at the ends, and generally about 1½ yard in length. See CHASUBLE.

Manipular (ma-nip'ū-lēr), a. Pertaining to the maniple.

Manipulate (ma-nip'ū-lāt), v.t. [L. manipulo, manipulatum, to lead by the hand, from L. manipulus. See MANIPLE.] 1. To handle or operate on with the hands, as in artistic or mechanical operations; to subject to certain processes; to treat or work up; as, the artist manipulates his colours with great dexterity; in experimenting the chemist requires to be careful in manipulating his materials and apparatus.—2. Fig. to operate upon skillfully, generally for the purpose of giving a false appearance to; to wrest for one's own ends; as, to manipulate accounts; to manipulate documentary evidence.

Manipulate (ma-nip'ū-lāt), v.i. To use the hands, as in scientific experiments, artistic processes, mechanical operations, or the like; as, he manipulates neatly or successfully.

Manipulation (ma-nip'ū-lā'shon), n. [See MANIPULATE, MANIPLE.] 1. The art of manipulating or working by hand; skillful or artistic manual management; manual and mechanical operation of any kind in science and art; specifically, in phar. the preparation of drugs; in chem. the preparation and employment of substances for experiments; and in animal magnetism, the motion of the hands by which the operator magnetizes those on whom he operates.—2. Fig. the act of operating upon skillfully, for the purpose of giving a false appearance to; the giving of a special turn, direction, or colour to for one's own purposes: said of figures, accounts, reports, &c.

There too, for many years before the Vatican Council, there was a gradual process of manipulation of primary religious instruction carried on, chiefly by means of the Jesuit Deharbe's catechism, working up to the full teaching of Papal infallibility. Saturday Rev.

Manipulative (ma-nip'ū-lāt-iv), a. Pertaining to or formed by manipulation.

Manipulator (ma-nip'ū-lāt-ēr), n. One who manipulates.

Manipulatory (ma-nip'ū-lā-to-ri), a. Of or pertaining to manipulation.

Manis (ma'nis), n. [The assumed singular of L. manes, ghosts, from the dismal appearance of the animals, and their seeking their food by night.] A genus of edentate mammals covered with large, hard, triangular scales with sharp edges, and overlapping each other like tiles on a roof: often called Scaly Lizards, Scaly Ant-eaters, or Pangolins. They inhabit the warmer parts of Asia and Four-toed or African Manis (M. tetradactyla).

Africa, and feed on ants, the nests of which they break into with their claws, which in walking are turned in. They differ from the true ant-eaters of South America in little else than in being provided with a scaly integument, and constitute with them and the armadillo the family Dasypodæ. When attacked they roll themselves up like a hedgehog; their scales, which are capable of inflicting unpleasant wounds in the hands of man and the mouths of predaceous animals, standing boldly out.

Manito, Manitou (man'i-tō, man'i-tō), n. Among certain of the American Indians, a name given to whatever is an object of religious awe or reverence, whether a good or evil spirit or a fetish. Two manitos or spirits are spoken of by pre-eminence, the one the spirit of good, the other the spirit of evil. See extract.

Gitche Manito the mighty,
He the Master of Life was painted
As an egg, with points projecting
To the four winds of the heavens.
Everywhere is the Great Spirit,
Was the meaning of the symbol.
Mitche Manito the mighty,
He, the dreadful Spirit of Evil,
As a serpent was depicted.
As Kenabek, the great serpent.
Very crafty, very cunning.
Is the creeping Spirit of Evil,
Was the meaning of this symbol. Louis J. Felt.

Manitrunk (man'i-trungk), n. [L. manus, the hand, and truncus, trunk.] In entom.

a term given to the anterior segment of the trunk, in which the head inosculates, or on which it turns.

Mankind (man-kind', man'kind, or man-kind), n. [Man and kind, in sense of race, stock, kin, the word being altered from older mankin, A. Sax. mancyn. See KIN.] 1. The human race; man taken collectively; man.

The proper study of mankind is man. Pope.

2. The males of the human race, as distinguished from the females; the male part of the human race.

Thou shalt not lie with mankind, as with woman-kind. Lev. xviii. 22.

3. † Human feelings; humanity.

You whose minds are good,
And have not forced all mankind from your breasts.

B. Jonson.

Mankind† (man'kind', a. 1. Resembling man, not woman, in form or nature; unwomanly; masculine; coarse; bold: often applied by the older poets to woman in a bad sense. 'A mankind witch! Hence with her, out o' door!' Shak.

'Twas a sound knock she gave me,

A plaguy mankind girl, how my brains totter!

Beau. & Fl.

2. Of virile power; ferocious. 'Terrible lions, many a mankind bear.' Chapman.

Manks (mangks), n. and a. Same as Manx.
Manless (man'les), a. 1. Destitute of men; not named, as a boat. [Rare.]—2.† Unmanly; base; cowardly; dastardly; unbecoming a man. 'Stuffed with manless cruelty.' Chapman.

Thât pusillanimity and manless subjugation.

Waterhouse.

Manlessly† (man'les-li), adv. In an unmanly or inhuman manner; inhumanly. 'Manlessly dragged to the Grecian fleet.' Chapman.

Manlike (man'lik), a. 1. Resembling a man in form or nature.

Under his forming hands a creature grew,

Manlike, but different sex. Milton.

2. Having the qualities proper to or becoming a man, as distinguished from a woman; manly.

Civil manlike exercise, which might stir up, and discipline, and ripen the strength they have.

Hammond.

Manliness (man'li-nes), n. The quality of being manly or of possessing the attributes of a man, especially boldness and courage; bravery; dignity.

Whilst her fond husband strove to lend relief

In all the silent manliness of grief. Goldsmith.

Manling (man'ling), n. A little man.

Augustus often called him his witty manling, for the littleness of his stature.

B. Jonson.

Manly (man'li), a. [Man and term. ly (which see).] Pertaining to or becoming a man; not boyish or womanish; firm; brave; undaunted; dignified; noble; stately.

His big manly voice,

Turning again toward childish treble, pipes
And whistles in his sound. Shak.

I'll . . . speak between the change of man and boy
With a reed voice; and turn two mincing steps
Into a manly stride. Shak.

Serene and manly, hardened to sustain
The load of life. Dryden.

He moves with manly grace. Dryden.

Manly (man'li), adv. With courage like a man; manfully; courageously. 'This tune goes manly.' Shak.

Man-mercier (man'mèr-sèr), n. One who deals by retail in cloths, &c., for male attire; a woollen draper.

Man-midwife (man'mid-wif), n. A man who practises obstetrics; an accoucheur.

Man-milliner (man'mil-in-ér), n. A male maker of millinery; hence, a man who busies himself with trifling occupations or embellishments.

Man-minded (man'mind-ed), a. Having the mind or qualities of a man.

When his man-minded offset (Queen Elizabeth) rose
To chase the deer at five. Tennyson.

Man-mountain (man'moun-tān), n. A man of gigantic size; a giant. Swift.

Manna (man'na), n. [Generally derived from the Heb. man hu, what is it?] 1. In Scrip. a substance miraculously furnished as food for the Israelites in their journey through the wilderness of Arabia. Ex. xvi. 15. What the substance was is unknown. Ehrenberg, in his Symbolæ Physicæ, affirms it to have been the saccharine substance called Mount Sinai manna yielded by the shrub Tamariscus mannifera of that region, a species of tamarisk. Hence—2. Divine or spiritual food. 3. In phar. the sweet concrete juice which is obtained by incisions made in the stem of a species of ash, Fraxinus Ornus, a native of Sicily, Calabria, and other parts of the south of Europe. It is either naturally concreted or excoriated and purified by art. At the present day the manna of commerce is collected exclusively in Sicily, where the manna-ash is cultivated for the purpose in regular plantations, called frasinetti. The best manna is in oblong pieces or flakes of a whitish or pale yellow colour, light, friable, and somewhat transparent. It has a slight peculiar odour, and a sweetish taste mixed with a slight degree of bitterness, and is employed as a gentle laxative for children or persons of weak habits. It is, however, generally used as an adjunct to other more active medicines. It consists principally of a crystallizable sugar named mannite, and an uncrystallizable sugar which possesses the sweet and purgative properties. Other sweetish secretions exuded by some other plants growing in warm and dry climates, as the Eucalyptus mannifera of Australia, the Tamaris mannifera or gallica of Arabia and Syria, are considered to be kinds of manna. Small quantities of manna, known under the name of Briançon manna, are obtained from the common larch (Larix europæa).

Manna-ash (man'na-ash), n. Fraxinus Ornus. See MANNA.

Manna-croup (man'na-krop), n. 1. A granular preparation of wheat-flour deprived of bran. It consists of the large hard grains of wheat-flour retained in the bolting-machine after the fine flour has been passed through its meshes. The French call it semoule or semouline, and the finest kind of it is said to be made in the south of France. It is used for making soups, puddings, &c.—2. The prepared seeds of a grass, Glyceria frutans.

Manner (man'nér), n. [O.E. manere, from Fr. maniere, manner, from O. Fr. manier, of or belonging to the hand, from L. manus, the hand—properly, the method of handling a thing.] 1. The mode in which anything is done; the way of performing or effecting anything; mode of action; method; style; form; fashion.

Find thou the manner, and the means prepare.

Dryden.

The temptations of prosperity insinuate themselves after a gentle, but very powerful, manner.

Atterbury.

2. Especially, customary or characteristic mode of acting, conducting one's self, and the like; peculiar or habitual way or carriage; habitual style, bearing, or conduct.

Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them.

Acts xvii. 2.

It can hardly be imagined how great a difference was in the humour, disposition, and manner of the army under Essex, and the other under Wall.

Clarendon.

Air and manner are more expressive than words.

Richardson.

Specifically, (a) the characteristic style of writing or thought in an author, or the distinctive peculiarity of an artist. See extract under MANNERISM. (b) pl. General way of life; customary conduct; morals; habits.

Manners with fortunes, humours turn with climes,
Tenets with books, and principles with times. Pope.

(c) pl. Carriage or behaviour, considered as decorous or indecorous, polite or unpolite, pleasing or displeasing; especially, ceremonious behaviour; decent and respectful deportment; civility.

Good manners is the art of making those people easy with whom we converse. Swift.

Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners.

Middleton.

Shall we, in our applications to the great God, take that to be religion, which the common reason of mankind will not allow to be manners?

South.

3. Sort; kind: in this use having often the sense of a plural—sorts, kinds.

Ye tithe mint and rue and all manner of herbs.

Luke xi. 42.

Blessed are ye, when men . . . shall say all manner of evil against you falsely.

Mat. v. 11.

—In a manner, in a certain degree, measure, or sense; to a certain extent; as, it is in a manner done already.

The bread is in a manner common. 1 Sam. xxi. 5.

Augustinus does in a manner confess the charge.

Baker.

SYN. Form, method, custom, habit, fashion, air, look, mien, aspect, appearance.

Manner† (man'ér), n. A thing stolen and found in the hands of the thief; mainour.

Mannered (man'èrd), a. 1. Having or possessed of manners, carriage, or conduct.

Reseeching you

To give her princely training, that she may be

Mannered as she is born. Shak.

2. In the fine arts, exhibiting the peculiar style of an author or artist, more particularly in its objectionable form. 'Hence inspiration plans his mannered lays.' *Grain*ger.

Mannerism (man'nér-izm), n. Adherence to the same manner; uniformity of manner, especially a tasteless uniformity, without freedom or variety; excessive adherence to a characteristic mode or manner of action or treatment.

Mannerism is pardonable, and is sometimes even agreeable, when the manner, though vicious, is natural. Few readers, for example, would be willing to part with the mannerism of Milton or of Burke. But a mannerism which does not sit easy on the mannerist, which has been adopted on principle, and which can be sustained only by constant effort, is always offensive. And such is the mannerism of Johnson. Macaulay.

Mannerist (man'nér-ist), n. One addicted to mannerism; one who in action or treatment adheres to one unvaried manner, whether natural or copied: said especially of writers and artists. See extract under MANNERISM.

Mannerliness (man'nér-li-nes), n. The quality of being mannerly, or civil and respectful in behaviour; civility; complaisance.

Mannerly (man'nér-li), a. Showing good manners; correct in deportment; civil; respectful; complaisant; not rude or vulgar.

What thou think'st meet and is most mannerly.

Shak.

Mannerly (man'nér-li), adv. With good manners or civility; respectfully; without rudeness.

Better it is to lap one's pottage like a dog, than to eat it mannerly with a spoon of the devil's giving.

Fuller.

Manners-bit (man'nérz-bit), n. A portion of a dish left by guests that the host may not feel himself reproached for insufficient preparation. [Local.]

Mannheim Gold (man'him göld), n. [From Mannheim, in Baden, where it was originally made.] A brass containing 80 parts copper and 20 parts zinc, used by jewellers to imitate gold.

Mannikin (man'ikin), n. Same as Manikin.

Beattie.

Manning† (man'ing), n. A day's work of a man.

Mannish (man'ish), a. 1. Having the nature of man; proper to the human species; human. Gover. [Rare.]—2. Characteristic of or resembling a man as distinguished from a woman; hence, as applied to a woman, masculine; unwomanly. 'A woman impudent and mannish grown.' Shak.

She's as much too mannish as he too womanish.

Beau. & Fl.

3. Simulating manhood; having the air or appearance of manliness without the reality. [Rare.]

We'll have a swashing and a martial outside

As many other mannish cowards have. Shak.

4. Characteristic of the age of manhood. 'Though now our voices have got the mannish crack.' Shak.

Mannishly (man'ish-li), adv. In a mannish manner; boldly.

Mannishness (man'ish-nes), n. The state or quality of being mannish; boldness; masculineness. 'The painted faces, the mannishness, and monstrous disguisedness of one sex.' Bp. Hall.

Mannite (man'it), n. (C₆H₁₄O₆). A peculiar variety of sugar obtained from manna, of which it forms the greater part. When manna is dissolved in boiling alcohol, the solution as it cools deposits the mannite in flaky and circular crystals, often arranged in concentric groups. It is also found in the juices which exude from several species of cherry and apple, in various mushrooms, in some roots, such as that of celery, in the fermented juice of beet-root, carrots, onions, &c., and also in some sea-weeds, such as Laminaria saccharina. It has a faint sweetish taste. Called also Mushroom-sugar.

Manœuvre (ma-nô'vèr or ma-nū'vèr), n. [Fr. manceuvre—main, L. manus, the hand, and œuvre, L. opera, work.] 1. A regulated, dexterous movement, particularly in an army or navy; any evolution, movement, or change of position among companies, battalions, regiments, ships, &c., for the purpose of distributing the forces in the best manner to meet the enemy.

The English commander wore close round upon the enemy, and actually separated their line, placing the central ships of the French between two fires. This bold and masterly manœuvre proved decisive.

Belsham.

ch, chain; ch, Sc. loch; g, go; j, job;

n, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

2. Management with address or artful design; an adroit procedure; intrigue; stratagem.

To make them the principal, not the secondary theatre of their manœuvres for securing a determined majority in Parliament. Burke.

3. A silly affected trick of manner to attract notice; as, he is full of manœuvres. [Scotch.]

Manœuvrer (ma-nô-vêr or ma-nû-vêr), v.i. pret. & pp. manœuvred; ppr. manœuvring. 1. To perform manœuvres; to move or change positions among troops or ships for the purpose of advantageous attack or defence, or in military exercise for the purpose of discipline.—2. The corps of half her senate Manure the fields of Thessaly. Addison.

Manure (ma-nūr'), n. [From the verb.] Any matter or substance added to the soil with the view of fertilizing it, or of accelerating vegetation and increasing the production of the crops; every substance which is used to improve the natural soil, or to restore to it the fertility which is diminished by the crops annually carried away. Animal, vegetable, and mineral substances are used for this purpose. Animal substances employed as manures comprehend the putrefying carcasses of animals, ground bones, blood, the excrements of animals, as the dung of horses, cattle, sheep, poultry, &c.; urine, guano (the decomposed excrement of aquatic birds); the scrapings of leather, horn, and the refuse of the shambles; the hair or wool of animals. Liquid manure, consisting of town sewage, the drainings of dung-heaps, stables, and cow-houses, is largely employed in many districts. Although farmers generally prefer to absorb the liquid excrements of their cattle by means of straw, yet sometimes more is produced than can be absorbed. In this case it is collected in tanks and distributed, sometimes from a large barrel drawn by a horse, over the fields, sometimes by a force-pump and hose, and sometimes by simple gravitation. The liquid manure of some large cities, as Edinburgh, is thus utilized, and increasing attention is being paid to this use of it, both from sanitary motives and its high value as a fertilizer. It is used chiefly to promote the growth of grass. Almost every kind of vegetable substance, in one state or another, is used as manure. The principal mineral substances employed as manures are lime and other alkaline substances, chalk, sand, clay, marl, various sulphates, phosphates, nitrates, &c.

Many (men'i), a. [A. Sax. manig, mænig, menig, mōnig, Goth. manags, D. menig, Dan. mange, O.H.G. manag, G. manch, many. In A. Sax. manig was used as an adjective (like G. manch) with both singulars and plurals; as, manig burh, many a city; rīne manig, many a man; manige men, many men. It was not till the thirteenth century that the indefinite article was used between it and the noun, as in 'many a man.' Grimm explains the word as derived from man, G. mann, and the word may have originally meant any man or a number of men. Another supposition is that it contains a nasalized form of the root mag, mah, seen in may, main, L. magnus, &c.] Numerous; comprising a great number of individuals.

Many are the afflictions of the righteous.
Ps. xxxiv. 19.

Followed by an or a before a noun in the singular number it has more of a distributive or emphatic force than with a plural noun.

Full many a gem of purest ray serene
The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear. Gray.

—The many, the great majority of people; the crowd; the common herd. 'The toiling many and the resting few.' Wordsworth.

The vulgar and the many are fit only to be led or driven. South.

—So many, (a) the same number of; as, packed together like so many herrings.

Alleys and archways, like so many cesspools, disgorged their offences of smell. Dickens.

(b) A certain number indefinitely; as, he took so many of these, so many of those, and so many of the others. — Too many, too strong; too powerful; too able; as, they are too many for us; we may also say he is too many, or one too many, for us. [Colloq.] Many is prefixed to a great number of adjectives, forming compounds which explain themselves; as, many-coloured, many-cornered, many-eyed, &c. — SYN. Numerous, multiplied, frequent, manifold, various, divers, sundry.

Many (men'i), n. [A. Sax. mænigeo, manigu, a crowd, from manig, many; Goth. managai.] 1. A multitude. 'O thou fond many.' Shak.

'The rank-scented many.' Shak. — 2. A considerable number: preceded by the indefinite article.

Like a many of these lipping hawthorn buds. Shak.

[The phrase a many (as well as a pretty many) has become obsolete in good usage, though it may be still heard among the uneducated; yet a good many and a great many are still in common use.]

Many (men'i), n. [See MEINY.] A retinue of servants; household.

The kings before their many rode. Fairfax.

Many-fountained (men'i-fount-änd), a. Having many fountains or streams; being the source of many streams.

The ancient name for a royal steward of high dignity and power, placed by the King of Scotland over a province instead of a thanage, and exercising the office of royal deputy, enjoying a third part of its revenues. Written also Mormaer (which see).

Map (map), n. [L. mapa, a Punic word signifying a napkin, table-napkin—mappa mundi (Fr. nappemonde, It. nappamondo), a delineation of the earth on a cloth; a map.]

1. A representation of the surface of the earth or of any part of it, or of the whole or any part of the celestial sphere, usually drawn on paper or other material. (See CHART.) The surface represented being spherical, a map upon a plane surface must be laid down according to the laws of perspective, or the representation must be that of the surface of a sphere upon a plane on the principles of perspective. This is what is termed projection. There are five principal projections; the orthographic, the stereographic, the globular, the conical, and the cylindrical or Mercator's, distinguished from each other by the different positions of the projecting point in which the eye is supposed to be placed. A map of the earth, or a portion of the earth, usually exhibits merely the positions of countries, mountains, rivers, lakes, cities, &c., relatively to one another, and by means of lines of latitude and longitude relatively to every other point on the earth's surface. But a map may be so coloured or shaded as to give a variety of information: for example, to indicate the geological structure, the amount of rainfall, the languages spoken, &c. Hence we have geological, meteorological, linguistic, and other kinds of maps. — 2. Fig. a distinct and precise representation of anything.

Map (map), v. t. pret. & pp. mapped; ppr. mapping. To draw or delineate in a chart or map, as the figure of any portion of land; hence, fig. to delineate or describe vividly and accurately: often with out; as, the country has been surveyed and mapped out.

I am near to the place where they should meet, if Pisanio have mapped it truly. Shak.

Maple (má'pl), n. [A. Sax. mapeltrēo, mapolder, a maple-tree.] A tree of the genus Acer, nat. order Aceraceæ or Sapindaceæ, peculiar to the northern and temperate parts of the globe. About fifty species are known, distributed through Europe, North America, and different parts of Asia. They are small or large trees, with a sweetish, rarely milky, sap, opposite deciduous, simple, usually lobed leaves, and axillary and terminal racemes or corymbs of small greenish flowers. The characteristic form of the fruit is shown in the figure. Two species are common in Britain, the great maple, often miscalled sycamore (A. pseudo-platanus), and the common maple (A. campestre). The wood of the former is valuable for various purposes, as for musical instruments, saddlery, wooden dishes, and many other articles both of furniture and machinery. The knotted parts of the sugar-maple furnish the pretty bird's-eye maple of cabinet-makers. The wood of several American species is also applied to various uses. The sugar or rock maple (A. saccharinum) is the most important species; this yields maple-sugar, which in many parts of North America is an important article of manufacture. A tree of ordinary size will yield from 15 to 30 gallons of sap, from which are made from 2 to 4 lbs. of sugar. — Maple-honey, the uncrystallized portion of the sap of the rock-maple from which sugar is made. — Maple-sugar, sugar obtained by evaporation from the juice of the rock-maple.

Sugar Maple (Acer saccharinum).

Map-mounter (map'mount-ér), n. A workman who backs maps with canvas, varnishes them, and fixes them on rollers, &c. Simmonds.

Mapper (map'ér-i), n. The art of planning and designing maps. Shak.

oil, pound; ü, Sc. abume; ý, Sc. fey.

Maqui (mak'wē), n. An evergreen or sub-evergreen shrub found in Chili, from the juice of whose fruit the Chilians make a kind of wine. It is the best known species of the genus Aristotelia (A. Maqui), and is referred to the nat. order Tiliaceae. It is cultivated as an ornamental shrub in England, and its fruit ripens.

Mar (mār), v.t. pret. & pp. marred; ppr. marring. [A. Sax. myrran, merran, amyr-ran, to hinder, to obstruct, to lead aside, to spoil; O.E. amerre, to mar; Icel. merja, to bruise or crush; O.H.G. marrian, M.H.G. merren, to hinder, to make void; from same root as mild (which see). The word passed from the German into the Romance languages: O. Fr. and Pr. marrir, Sp. marrar, L.L. marrire, to annoy, to injure.] To injure in any way; to spoil; to impair; to de-face; to disfigure; to deform.

Neither shalt thou mar the corners of thy beard.

Lev. xix. 27.

When brewers mar their malt with water. Shak.

But birth is marred, and the good cheer is lost.

Dryden.

Each passion dimm'd his face
Thrice changed with pale, ire, envy, and despair;
Which marr'd his borrowed visage. Milton.

Mar (mār), n. A blot; a blemish; an injury. Ascham.

Mar (mār), n. A lake. See MERE.

Mará (mā'ra), n. A rodent animal, sometimes called the Patagonian Cavy (Dolichotis patagonicus). It lives in forms like the hare, a single couple usually occupying each form.

Mara (mā'ra), n. [Icel. mara, the nightmare.] In Norse myth. a demon who torments men with frightful visions.

The word brag has an etymological connection with the name of Bragi, the Norse god of song and mirth, while the faithful devotees of Bragi fall after a while under the power of Mara, a savage demon who tortures men with visions and crushes them even to death, and who still survives, though with mitigated powers, as the nightmare of modern days.

Isaac Taylor.

Marabou-stork (mā-rā-bō'stork), n. The name given to two species of storks, the delicate white feathers beneath the wing and tail of which form the marabou-feathers imported to this country. One species is a native of West Africa (Leptopitibus marabou), another is common in India, where it is generally called the adjutant; it is the Leptopitibus Argala.

Marabout, Maraboot (mā-rā-bōt'), n. In Northern Africa, among the Berbers, one of a kind of saints or sorcerers who are held in high estimation. They distribute amulets, affect to work miracles, and are thought to exercise the gift of prophecy.

Maracan (mar'a-kan), n. [Brazilian maracana.] The name given in Brazil to several of the macaws.

Marah (mā'ra), n. [Heb. bitterness. The name given to a place on the east of the Red Sea from the bitterness of its waters.] Bitter-water; bitterness.

All their lives long, with the unweaned bread

And bitter herbs of exile and its fears,

The wasting famine of the heart they fed,

And slaked its thirst with marah of their tears.

Longfellow.

Marai (ma-rā'), n. A sacred inclosure or temple among the islanders of the Pacific Ocean.

Maranade (mar-a-nād), v.t. Same as Mari-nate.

With us the smaller eels are sometimes potted or maranaded. Couch.

Maranatha (mar-a-nā'tha), n. [Syr.] The Lord comes or has come: a word used by the apostle Paul in expressing a curse. This word was used in anathematizing persons for great crimes; as much as to say, 'May the Lord come quickly to take vengeance on thee for thy crime.'

Maranta (ma-ran'ta), n. [After B. Maranti, a Venetian physician and botanist.] A genus of plants, nat. order Marantaceae. The arrow-root of commerce is obtained from the rhizomes of M. arundinacea, an herbaceous branching plant 4 to 6 feet high, with narrow ovate leaves and small white solitary or loosely racemose flowers. It is a native of Tropical America. See ARROW-ROOT.

Marantaceæ (mar-an-tā'sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of endogenous plants found wild in tropical countries only. Called also Canna-cææ. They are perennial herbs, with fibrous roots or fleshy creeping rhizomes, alternate simple leaves with sheathing foot-stalks, and irregular, often handsome, racemose or paniced flowers. The genus Canna is commonly cultivated under the name of Indian shot. See Indian shot under INDIAN, MARANTA.

Marasca (mar-as'ka), a. [See MARASCHINO.] A term applied to the small black wild variety of cherry from which maraschino is distilled.

Maraschino (mar-as-kē'nō), n. [It., from marasca, amarasca, a kind of sour cherry, from L. amarus, bitter.] A delicate spirit distilled from cherries; the best is from Zara in Dalmatia, and is obtained from the marasca cherry.

Marasmus (ma-raz'mus), n. [Gr. marasmos, from marainō, to cause to pine or waste away.] A wasting of flesh without fever or apparent disease; atrophy; phthisis; consumption. Marasmus often depends on disease of the mesenteric glands, or some obstruction in the course of the chyle.

Pining atrophy,

Marasmus, and wide wasting pestilence. Milton.

Maraud (ma-rād'), v.t. [Fr. marauder, to beg, play the rogue, from maraud, a rogue, a vagabond.] To rove in quest of plunder; to make an excursion for booty; to plunder.

Maraud (ma-rād'), n. Spoliation by marauders.

While it would expose the whole extent of the surrounding country to maraud and ravage.

W. Irving.

Marauder (ma-rād'er), n. One who marauds; a rover in quest of booty or plunder; a plunderer.

The pirates had been a troublesome enemy, because, as flying marauders, lurking, and watching their opportunities, they could seldom be brought to action.

De Quincey.

Maravedi (mā-rā-vā-dē'), n. [Sp.; so called from Marabittin, an Arabian dynasty which reigned in Spain and Africa, lit. the steadfast.] A small copper coin of Spain, less than a farthing sterling. It is no longer current. The gold maravedi, a still older coin, was worth about fourteen shillings.

Marble (mār'bl), n. [Fr. marbre, L. marmor, marble; Gr. marmaros, any stone or rock which sparkles in the light, from mar-mairō, to flash, to gleam.] 1. The popular name of any species of calcareous stone or mineral, of a compact texture, and of a beautiful appearance, susceptible of a good polish. Marble is limestone, or a stone which may be calcined to lime, a carbonate of lime; but limestone is a more general name, comprehending the calcareous stones of an inferior texture, as well as those which admit a fine polish. The term is limited by mineralogists and geologists to the several varieties of carbonate of lime which have more or less of a granular and crystalline texture. In sculp. the term is applied to several compact or granular kinds of stone susceptible of a very fine polish. The varieties of marble are exceedingly numerous, and greatly diversified in colour. Marble is much used for statues, busts, pillars, chimney-pieces, monuments, &c. By far the largest portion of the marble used by modern sculptors comes from the quarries of Carrara in Italy, but some is also got from Greece. Many sorts of variegated marbles of great beauty are found in Britain.—2. A little ball of marble, of other stone, or of baked clay, used by children in play.—3. A column, tablet, or the like, of marble, remarkable for some inscription or sculpture.—Arundel marbles or Arundelian marbles, a collection of ancient sculptured marbles, purchased by Sir William Petty at Smyrna in 1624 for the Earl of Arundel, whose grandson presented it to the University of Oxford. The most curious and interesting portion of this collection is called the Parian Chronicle, from having been kept in the island of Paros. In its perfect state the inscription contained a chronicle of the principal events in Grecian history from the time of mythical or semi-mythical Cæcrops (1682 B.C.) to the archonship of Diognetus (264 B.C.), but part of it is now lost, and what remains is much corroded and defaced.—Elgin marbles, a splendid collection of basso-relievos and fragments of statuary brought from the Parthenon at Athens to England by Lord Elgin in 1814, afterwards purchased by the government, and now lodged in the British Museum. The largest part of them (ninety-two pieces in all) were, perhaps, executed from designs by Phidias, and are considered among the finest remains of ancient art.—Fire marble, a kind of lumachel in which red colours predominate.

Marble (mār'bl), a. 1. Composed of marble; as, a marble pillar.—2. Variegated in colour; stained or veined like marble.

The appendix shall be printed by itself, stitched, and with a marble cover. Swift.

3. Hard; insensible; as, a marble heart.

Marble (mār'bl), v.t. pret. & pp. marbled; ppr. marbling. To give an appearance of marble to; to stain or vein like marble; as, to marble the edges of a book.

Marble-breasted (mār'bl-bre'st-ed), a. Insensible; hard-hearted. 'Marble-breasted tyrant.' Shak.

Marble-constant (mār'bl-kon-stant), a. Immoveable as marble; firm; constant. Shak.

Marble-cutter (mār'bl-kut-er), n. One who hews marble; a worker in marble; an instrument or machine for cutting marble.

Marbling (mār'bling), n. 1. The art or practice of variegating in colour, in imitation of marble.—2. Any marking resembling that of veined marble; as, the marbling of flesh-meat produced by the fat and lean being so intermixed as to produce that appearance.

Marbly (mār'bli), a. Resembling marble in structure or appearance. Mrs. Jameson.

Marc (mārk), n. [Fr.; L. emarcus, a kind of vine—a word of Celtic origin.] The refuse matter which remains after the pressure of fruit, as of grapes, olives, &c.

Marc (mārk), n. [See MARK.] A weight of gold and silver; a money of account. See MARK.

Marca (mār'ka), n. See MANCA.

Marcasite (mār'kas-it), n. [A word of Arabic origin; It. marcassita; Fr. marcasite.] Iron pyrites or bisulphide of iron. Marcasite occurs crystallized in modified rhombic prisms, and also in reniform and botryoidal masses. It is of a paler colour than ordinary pyrites, being nearly of the colour of tin, and its lustre is more strongly metallic. The older mineralogists gave this name to pyrites occurring in thin veins, and that of pyrites to nodular masses.

Marcasitic, Marcasitical (mār'ka-sit'ik, mār'ka-sit'ik-al), a. Pertaining to marcasite; of the nature of marcasite.

Marassin (mār'kas'sin), n. [Fr.] In her. a young wild boar.

Marcrescent (mār'ses-ent), a. [L. marcescens, marcescens, ppr. of marcesco, to fade.] Withering; fading; decaying; specifically, in bot. withering, but not falling off till the part bearing it is perfected; as, a marcescent perianth.

Marcrescible (mār'ses-i-bl), a. That may wither; liable to decay.

Margraviaceæ (mār'gra-vi-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [In honour of Margrave, the German naturalist.] A small unimportant group of hypogynous exogenous plants found in Central America, remarkable for their cucullate bracts, now considered as a tribe of Ternstroemiaceæ. They are climbing or epiphytic plants, with leathery entire leaves, and flowers in terminal racemes.

March (mārch), n. [O.Fr. march, from L. Martius, pertaining to Mars, Martius mensis, Mars' month, Mars, the god of war.] The third month of the year.—Mad as a

ch, chain; ch, Sc. lock; g, go; j, job;

h, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

March hare, quite mad or crazy; as mad as can be. [The phrase has its origin in the fact that March is the rutting month of hares, during which they are in an excited and violent state.]

March (mārch), n. [Probably directly from the Fr. marche, a boundary (It. Sp. Pg. Pr. marcha), but the word is originally Teutonic: A. Sax. meare, a border. See MARK.] A frontier or boundary of a territory; a border; especially applied to the boundaries or confines of political divisions, and also to the country lying near and about such: in Scotland commonly applied to the boundaries, or the marks which determine them, of conterminous estates or lands, whether large or small. The term is most familiar to us as applied to the boundaries between England and Wales, and England and Scotland. The marches between the latter countries were divided into three portions, the western, the middle, and the eastern marches, each of which had courts peculiar to itself, and a kind of president or governor, who was called warden of the marches.

Geneva is situated in the marches of several dominions—France, Savoy, and Switzerland. Fuller.

—Riding of the marches, a practice still observed occasionally in one or other of the burghs of Scotland, the original object of which was to preserve in the memory of the inhabitants the limits of their property. In observing this practice the magistrates and chief men of the borough, mounted on horseback, ride in procession along the boundaries of the property belonging to the borough, and perform various ceremonies.

March (mārch), v.t. To border; to be contiguous; to be situated next, with a boundary line between; as, his land marches on or with mine.

March (mārch), v.i. [Fr. marcher; It. marchiare. Origin doubtful. Diez and others derive it from Fr. marche, a boundary (see MARCH, a frontier or boundary), through such usages as in 'aller de marche en marche,' to wander from boundary to boundary; Brachet takes it from L. marcus, a hammer, through L.L. marcare, to beat the ground with the feet, to march.] 1. To move by steps and in order, as soldiers; to move in a military manner; to walk with a steady regular tread. Spenser.

Beyond the river we'll encamp ourselves,
And on to-morrow bid them march away. Shak.

Singing of men that in battle array,
Ready in heart and ready in hand,
March with banner and bugle and fife
To the death, for their native land. Tennyson.

2. To walk in a grave, deliberate, or stately manner.

Like thee, great son of Jove, like thee,
When clad in rising majesty,
Thou marchest down our Delos' hills. Prior.

—Marching regiment, a colloquial term for an infantry regiment of the line: generally used in a disparaging sense. Sir W. Scott.

One was sent to college, the other put into a marching regiment. Lord Lytton.

March (mārch), v.t. 1. To cause to move in military order; to cause to move in a body; to cause to move in regular procession. 'To march a bloody host.' Shak.

Because the distracted state of Persia rendered it a prey to the first invader; he marched an army, . . . and took possession of two important provinces. Brougham.

2. To cause to go anywhere at one's command and under one's guidance; as, the policeman marched his prisoner to the police-office.

March (mārch), n. [See the verb.] 1. The measured and uniform walk, or forward movement of a body of men, as soldiers, moving simultaneously and in order; a regular advance of a body of men, in which they keep time with each other and sometimes with music; stately and deliberate walk; steady or laboured progression: used figuratively in regard to poetry from its rhythm resembling the measured harmonious stepping of soldiery.

We came to the roots of the mountain, and had a very troublesome march to gain the top of it. Addison.

Waller was smooth, but Dryden taught to join
The varying verse, the full resounding line,
The long majestic march and energy divine. Pope.

2. An advance of soldiers from one halting place to another; a day's journey of soldiery; the distance passed over; as, a march of 20 miles.

In our third march we found an unexpected supply of food, the hills being full of hares. De Foe.

3. Progressive development; advancement; progress. 'The march of intellect.' Southey.

And this happens merely because men will not bide their time, but will insist on precipitating the march of affairs. Buckle.

4. Milit. a signal to move; a particular beat of the drum.

The drums presently striking up a march, they make no longer stay, but forward they go directly. Knolles.

5. In music, a composition of a strongly rhythmic character, either in duple or triple time, designed to accompany and regulate the movement of troops or other bodies of men.—To make a march, in the game of euchre, to take all the tricks of a single deal. Hoyle.—March past, a march past the reviewing officer or some high dignitary on parade.

Marchantia (mār-chan'ti-a), n. [In honour of Nicholas Marchant, a French botanist.] A genus of plants, nat. order Hepaticæ, the type of the sub-order Marchantiaceæ (which see).

Marchantiaceæ, Marchantieæ (mār-chan'ti-ā'sē-ē, mār-chan'ti-ē-ē), n. pl. Cryptogamic plants, forming a sub-order of the Hepaticæ. The frond is never leafy and frequently forked; the male organs are immersed in sessile or stalked discoid or peltate receptacles, and the capsules are disposed symmetrically on the under side of stalked wheel-shaped receptacles.

Marcher (mārch'ēr), n. 1. One who marches. 2. The lord or officer who defended the marches or borders of a territory.—The lords marchers of England were the noblemen who lived on the marches of Wales and Scotland, and who, in times past, had their laws and regal power, until they were abolished by 27 Henry VIII.

Marchet (mār'chet), n. [L.L. marceta, a fee of a mark.] A pecuniary fine anciently paid by the tenant to his lord, for the marriage of one of the tenant's daughters. This custom prevailed both in England and Scotland. See MEROCHETA.

Marchioness (mār'shun-es), n. [L.L. marchio, a marquis. See MARQUIS.] The wife or widow of a marquis; a female having the rank and dignity of a marquis.

March-mad (mārch'mad), a. Extremely foolish or excitable; rash; foolhardy. See under MARCH, the month. Sir W. Scott.

March-man (mārch'man), n. A person living near the march dividing two countries; a borderer.

Now Bowden Moor the march-man won,
And sternly shook his plumed head,
As glanced his eye o'er Halidon. Sir W. Scott.

Marchpane (mārch'pān), n. [O. Fr. marcepain, Fr. massepain, It. marzapane, Sp. mazapan, G. marzipan, marzipan, perhaps from L. G. maza, a barley-cake, and L. panis, bread, or from the names Martius or Marcus and panis.] A kind of sweet bread or biscuit; a spice-cake composed of sugar, nuts, pine-apple, almonds, sometimes with poppy-seeds and Indian corn; a macaroon.

Good thou, save me a piece of marcpane. Shak.

See MARCH, a boundary.] 1. A visible sign or impression, as a dot, line, streak, stamp, figure, or the like, left or made by one substance on another; as, a mark of chalk, charcoal, ink; the mark of a dirty finger; a mark of a seal in wax; the mark of a whip on one's body. A mark may be made either by leaving a portion of one substance on another, as in the case of chalk on a black-board, or by an incision or indentation made in a softer body, as in the case of a seal in soft wax, or by a change, as discoloration, or a bruise produced in the substance of the body itself, as a wale left by a whip.

'Twas then old soldiers cover'd o'er with scars,
The marks of Pyrrhus or the Punic wars. Dryden.

2. Any sign by which a thing can be distinguished; an indication, visible token, or evidence.

There are scarce any marks left of a subterraneous fire. Addison.

As the confusion of tongues was a mark of separation, so the being of one language is a mark of union. Bacon.

3. Pre-eminence; distinction; importance; consequence; eminent position; as, a man of mark.

A fellow of no mark nor likelihood. Shak.

4. Observance; respectful attention or regard; hence, an example; pattern. [Rare.]

Laws for all faults,
But faults so countenanced, that the strong statutes
Stand like the forfeits in a barber's shop,
As much in mock as mark. Shak.

5. The object of respectful attention or regard; hence, an example; pattern. [Rare.]
He was the mark and glass, copy and book,
That fashioned others. Shak.

6. Anything to which a missile may be directed.

France was a fairer mark to shoot at than Ireland. Sir F. Davies.

Hence—7. The point to be reached; the proper standard; the exact amount; as, to be within the mark, to be moderate in one's estimate; to be below or under the mark, to be below the proper standard; to be up to the mark; and so on.

It's only a question between the larger sum and the smaller. I shall be within the mark any way. Dickens.

Feeling all the better for my little rashness, so that I am quite up to the mark for our march. W. H. Russell.

8. A character, generally in the form of a cross, made by a person who cannot write his name, and intended as a substitute for it. '—Bill Stumps. His mark.' Dickens.

9. A weight still used in some parts of Europe for various commodities, especially gold and silver. Its weight varied, but was always somewhat more than $\frac{1}{2}$ lb.—

10. The name of various coins still or formerly in use in different places; as, (a) an old English coin of the value of 13s. 4d. (b) A coin used in Hamburg of the value of about 1s. 2d. (c) In the new coinage of the German Empire, a coin of nearly the same value as the English shilling.—A mark banco is a money of account in Hamburg equal to nearly 1s. 6d. See MERK.—11. (b) Private mark, a mark made by a merchant on his goods, intelligible only to himself and his assistants, indicative of the price at which they are to be sold.—God bless or God save the mark! Save the mark! &c., ejaculatory or parenthetical phrases expressive of irony, scorn, depreciation, surprise, or a humorous sense of the extraordinary. 'In archery when an archer shot well it was customary to cry out 'God save the mark!' that is, prevent any one coming after to hit the same mark and displace my arrow. Ironically it is said to a novice whose arrow is nowhere.' Brewer.

For he made me mad
To see him shine so brisk and smell so sweet,
And talk so like a waiting-gentlewoman
Of guns and drums and wounds,—God save the mark! Shak.

(As if he had said, 'A pretty fellow this to direct his discourse to such subjects!')

To be ruled by my conscience, I should stay with the Jew my master, who, God bless the mark, is a kind of devil. Shak.

My father had no more nose, my dear, saving the mark! than there is upon the back of my hand. Steele.

Marker (mār'k-er), n. 1. One who marks; specifically, (a) one who marks the score at games, as at billiards. (b) At English schools and universities, the monitor who calls the roll at divine service. (c) Milit. the soldier who is the pivot round which a body of men wheels, or who marks the direction of an alignment.—2. A counter used in card-playing.

Market (mār'ket), n. [O. Fr. markiet, It. mercato, L. mercatus, from mercior, to buy, from merc, mercis, merchandise; hence also O. H. G. mercat, D. and G. markt.]

1. An occasion on which goods are publicly exposed for sale and buyers assemble to purchase; the meeting together of people for selling and buying at private sale, as distinguished from an auction, where the sale is public; a fair.—2. A public place in a city or town where goods are exposed for sale; a public building in which provisions or other wares are exposed to sale; a market-place; a market-house.—3. The crowd of people assembled in a market for business or pleasure; as, there was a large market to-day.—4. Country, region, district, or town where anything is in demand; country or place of sale; as, the British market; the foreign market; the London market.

There is a third thing to be considered—how a market can be obtained for produce, or how production can be limited to the capacities of the market. J. S. Mill.

5. Purchase or sale, or rate of purchase and sale; hence, price; cost; worth; valuation; as, to make market; a ready market; a dull market; the market is high or low; I took my wares to town, but could not find a market.

So of old
Was blood and life at a low market sold. Dryden.

6. In law, the privilege of having a public market. Market is defined by statute to be the liberty by grant or prescription whereby a town is enabled to set up and open shops, &c., at a certain place therein, for buying and selling, and better provision of such victuals as the subject wanteth. The general rule of law is, that all sales and contracts of anything vendible in fairs or markets—overt (that is, open markets) shall not only be good between the parties, but also binding on all those that have any right or property therein. The law of Scotland differs from that of England as to the legal effect of a sale in open market. The English law recognizes the principle that property may, in some cases, be transferred by sale, although the seller has no right of property in the goods. In Scotland, no such privilege is attached to sales in open market; and the owner of goods sold by one who has stolen them, or to whom they may have been lent, may reclaim them from the purchaser.—Market is the first part of a considerable number of compound words of obvious signification; such as, market-people, market-place, &c.

Market (mār'ket), v. i. To deal in a market; to buy or sell; to make bargains for provisions or goods.

Market (mār'ket), v. t. To offer for sale in a market; to traffic in; to vend; to sell.

And rich bazaars, whither, from all the world,
Industrious merchants meet, and market there
The world's collected wealth. Southey.

Market-stead† (mărk'et-sted), n. A market-place.

Market-town (mărk'et-toun), n. A town in which markets are held, by privilege, at stated times.

Marking (mărk'ing), n. 1. The act of impressing a mark upon something.—Marking of goods, in Scots law, one of those forms of constructive delivery by which the property of a thing sold is attempted to be transferred while the seller retains possession. Thus the property of cattle sold while grazing is transferred by their being marked for the buyer, if in the herds or field of a third party.—2. A mark or series of marks upon something; characteristic arrangement of natural colouring; as, the markings on a bird's eggs or of the petals of a flower.

Marking-ink (mărk'ing-ingk), n. An indelible ink used for marking linen, &c. See INK.

Marking-nut (mărk'ing-nut), n. The seed or nut of the Semecarpus Anacardium, so called because the juice contained in its fruit stains linen of a deep and indelible black colour. The name is sometimes given also to the cashew-nut (which see). Called also Malacca-bean.

Markis,† n. A marquess. Chaucer.

Markisette,† n. The wife of a marquiss. Chaucer.

Markman† (mărk'man), n. Same as Marksmanship. Shak.

Marriage (ma'rij), n. [Fr. mariage, Pr. maridatge, maritaje, It. maritaggio, L.L. maritaticum, marriage, from L. maritus, a husband, from mas, maris, a male.] 1. The act of uniting a man and woman for life; the legal union of a man and woman for life; the state or condition of being married; wedlock. Marriage is regarded by the law as a civil contract binding the parties to certain reciprocal obligations, and the general principle of law respecting this, as well as other civil contracts, is, that it is to be held valid according to the usage of the country wherein it is made. Although among Protestants marriage has ceased to be regarded as a sacrament, yet in most Protestant countries the entrance into the married state has continued to be accompanied with religious observances. These are not, however, in the eye of the law, essential to the constitution of a valid marriage, any further than the sovereign power may have seen it proper to annex them to and incorporate them with the civil contract. By the law of England marriages may be solemnized—1. According to the rites of the Church; or 2. According to the provisions of the act 6 and 7 Will. IV. lxxxv., amended by 1 Vict. xxii., and various subsequent acts. Marriages, according to the rites of the Church, are celebrated or solemnized by banns; by notice in lieu of banns, which is a license dispensing with the publication of banns; or, by license from a bishop, which dispenses with both the preceding forms. Marriages of Dissenters, as of Jews, Quakers, Roman Catholics, and other sects and persuasions, may be legally and adequately solemnized in their own synagogues, tabernacles, chapels, or meeting-houses, subject to a few necessary restrictions. In accordance with the provisions of the act above cited, marriage may take place by the certificate of the superintendent-registrar for the poor-law union, parish, or place in which the parties reside, with or without license. By the law of Scotland marriages may be either regular or irregular, and irregular marriages are by mere consent without the intervention of a clergyman. A regular marriage is performed by a clergyman in presence of at least two witnesses, and is preceded by the proclamation of banns according to the rules of the Church, or by intimation to a registrar and publication outside the registrar's office. The second kind of marriage may be contracted by any form of ceremony, without the proclamation of banns or the aid of a clergyman, provided the parties on the occasion express a solemn acceptance of each other as man and wife. It is also contracted by the writing of the parties without any ceremony, provided the writing express their acceptance of each other as man and wife. A marriage may also be constituted by the verbal acceptance of each other by the parties as man and wife in the presence of witnesses, or by a promise followed by intercourse. Also when a man and a woman live and cohabit together, and conduct themselves as man and wife in the society and neighbourhood of which they are members, till the belief and reputation that they are married become general, their marriage is presumed without any evidence of a marriage having been entered into.

Marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undefiled. Heb. xiii. 4.

O, Hamlet, what a falling off was there! From me, whose love was of that dignity That it went hand in hand even with the vow I made to her in marriage. Shak.

The reason why so few marriages are happy is because young ladies spend their time in making nets, not in making cages. Swift.

2. A feast made on the occasion of a marriage.

The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain king, which made a marriage for his son. Mat. xxii. 2.

3. Intimate union.

Let me not to the marriage of true minds Admit impediments. Shak.

—Complex marriage, that peculiar domestic relation between the sexes existing in the American sect calling themselves Perfectionists. See extract.

The central domestic fact of the household is the complex marriage of its members to each other, and to all; a rite which is to be understood as taking place on the entrance of every new member, whether male or female, into association; and which is said to convert the whole body into one marriage circle; every man becoming the husband and brother of every woman; every woman the wife and sister of every man. Hepworth Dixon.

—Marriage articles or marriage contract, contract or agreement on which a marriage is founded. —Marriage favours, knots of white ribbons or bunches of white flowers worn at weddings. —Marriage portion, a portion given to a woman at her marriage. —Marriage settlement, an arrangement usually made before marriage, and in consideration of it, whereby a jointure is secured to the wife, and portions to children, in the event of the husband's death.—Marriage, Wedding, Nuptials, Matrimony, Wedlock. Marriage is the union, or the act of forming or entering into the union; wedding is rather the ceremonies celebrating the union or marriage, but not essential to it. Marriages are often constituted without a wedding. Nuptials is the Latin word for wedding, but is used in a more dignified sense—we say a village wedding, but the nuptials of a prince; matrimony is the married state, or the state into which marriage brings us; wedlock is the Anglo-Saxon or vernacular English word for matrimony, and hardly differs from it in meaning. Marriage is sometimes used for matrimony, but matrimony is never used for marriage.—SYN. Matrimony, wedlock, wedding, nuptials.

Marriageable (ma'rij-a-bl), a. 1. Of an age suitable for marriage. 'A young heiress whom I begin to look upon as marriageable.' Spectator.—2. Suitable for close union.

Marry-muff (ma'ri-muf), n. A coarse common cloth.

Mars (mârz), n. 1. A Latin deity, identified at an early period by the Latins themselves with the Greek Ares. He was principally worshipped as the god of war, and as such bore the epithet Gravivus; but he was also regarded as the patron of agriculture, which procured him the title of Silvanus; and as the patron of the state, in virtue of which he was called Quirinus. In works of art Mars is generally represented as of a youthful but powerful figure, armed with the helmet, shield, and spear. At other times he is bearded and heavily armed.—2. The planet which comes next to the earth in the order of distance from the sun, usually marked by the character δ . It is a brilliant star of a slight red tint. Mean distance from the sun 139,312,000 miles; period of one revolution about the sun, 686 $\frac{2}{3}$ of our days; period of revolution on its axis, 24 hours 39 minutes 21 $\frac{3}{4}$ seconds; diameter, about Mars, after Flaxman.

4100 miles. Two small moons revolve round it.—3. In old chem. a term for iron.—4. In her. a name for the colour gules, or red, in the coats of sovereign princes.

Marsala (mâr-sâ'la), n. An inferior kind of sherry wine brought from Marsala in Sicily.

Marsdenia (mâr-z-den'i-a), n. [In honour of William Marsden, secretary to the admiralty, author of a History of Sumatra.] A genus of climbing shrubs or large undershrubs, nat. order Asclepiadaceæ, natives of the warmer regions of both worlds, one species occurring in the Mediterranean region. There are about sixty species, with opposite leaves and small flowers in terminal or axillary cymes.

Marseillais (mâr-sâ-yâ), n. mas., Marseillaise (mâr-sâ-yâz), n. fem. A native or inhabitant of Marseilles.

Marseillais (mâr-sâ-yâ), a. mas., Marseillaise (mâr-sâ-yâz), a. fem. Belonging or pertaining to Marseilles. — Marseillaise Hymn, the national song of the French Republic. The words, and, as is generally believed, the music were written in 1792 by Rouget de l'Isle, an officer in garrison at Strasbourg, on the occasion of a body of volunteers leaving that city for the war against Austria and Prussia, and was entitled by him Chant du Guerre de l'armée du Rhin. The Parisians having heard it sung, for the first time, by the band of patriots whom Barbaroux brought from Marseilles to aid in the revolution of 10th August, 1792, it received from them the name it has ever since borne. Fétis gives Naveoille as the musical composer's name; other authorities say the music was taken from a German mass. Often called merely The Marseillaise.

Marsh (mârsh), n. [A Sax. mere, for meric (= mere-ish), a marsh or bog, an adj. form from mere, a mere; similarly L.G. marsh, O.D. maersche, meersch; allied to L. mare, the sea.] A tract of low land, usually or occasionally covered with water, or very wet and miry; a fen; a swamp; a bog; a morass. Low land occasionally overflowed by the tides is called salt-marsh.

Marsh (mârsh), a. Pertaining to wet, swampy, or boggy places: a term applied to various plants which grow in marshy places; as, marsh-mallow; marsh-marigold.

Marshal (mârshal), n. [O.E. mareschal; Fr. maréchal; L.L. mareschalus, mariscalcus, from O.H.G. marahscalc, marahscalcus — O.G. marah, marach, a horse, and scalc (Mod. G. schalk) a servant.] Originally, an officer who had the care of horses; a groom. In more modern usage.—1. The chief officer of arms, whose duty was to regulate combats in the lists.—2. One who regulates rank and order at a feast or any other assembly, directs the order of procession, and the like.

Through the hall there walked to and fro
A jolly yeoman, marshal of the same,
Whose name was Appetite. Spenser.

3. A harbinger; a pursuivant; one who goes before a prince to declare his coming and provide entertainment.

Her face, when it was fairest, had been but as a marshal to lodge the love of her in his mind, which now was so well placed as it needed no help of outward harbinger. Str P. Sidney.

4. In France, the highest military officer. In other countries of Europe a marshal is a military officer of high rank, and called field-marshal.—5. In America, a civil officer appointed by the president and senate of the United States in each judicial district, answering to the sheriff of a county. His duty is to execute all precepts directed to him, issued under the authority of the United States.—6. An officer of any private society, appointed to regulate their ceremonies and execute their orders.—Earl marshal of England, the eighth officer of state: an honorary title, and personal, until made hereditary by Charles II. in the family of Howard, duke of Norfolk. During a vacancy in the office of high-constable, the earl-marshal has jurisdiction in the court of chivalry.—Earl marshal or marischal of Scotland, an officer who had command of the cavalry, under the constable. The office was held by the family of Keith, but forfeited by rebellion in 1715.—Knight marshal, or marshal of the king's (or queen's) household, an officer whose office is said to be to hear and determine pleas of the crown, and suits between those of the royal household and others within the verge, that is, within a circle of 12 miles round the royal palace. His criminal jurisdiction is not now used.—Marshal or provoost-marshal of the army and of the navy. See under PROVOOST.—Marshal of the King's (or Queen's) Bench, formerly an officer who had the custody of the prison called the King's (or Queen's) Bench, in Southwark. The act 5 and 6 Vict. xxii. abolished this office, and substituted an officer who is called keeper of the Queen's prison.

Marshal (mârshal), v.t. pret. & pp. marshalled; ppr. marshalling. 1. To dispose in order; to arrange in a suitable manner; as, to marshal an army; to marshal troops.

False Wizard, avant! I have marshalled my clan;
Their swords are a thousand, their bosoms are one! Campbell.

2.† To lead, as a harbinger.

Thou marshallest me the way that I was going. Shak.

3. In her. to dispose in due order the several parts of an escutcheon, or the coats of arms of distinct families.

Marshall (mârshal-êr), n. One who disposes in due order.

Dryden was the great refiner of English poetry, and the best marshall of words. Trapp.

Marshalsea (mârshal-sê), n. [E. marshal, and O.E. sea, see, a seat. Comp. see, the seat of episcopal power.] In England, formerly an ancient prison of London, originally belonging to the marshal of the royal household, described in Dickens's novel Little Dorrit.—Court of marshalsea, a court formerly held before the steward and marshal of the royal house, to administer justice between the domestic servants of the king or queen. In the marshalsea there were two courts of record: (1.) The original court of the marshalsea, which held plea of all trespasses committed within the verge, that is, within a circle of 12 miles round the sovereign's residence. (2.) The palace-court (which see) created by Charles I., and abolished in 1849.

Marsileaceæ (mār'sil-ē-ā'se-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of acrogenous cryptogams, consisting of two distinct groups, to the first of which belong Marsilea and Pilularia, to the second Azolla and Salvinia.

Marsipobranchii (mār-sip'ō-brang'ki-i), n. pl. [Gr. marsipos, a pouch, and branchia, gills.] The order of fishes comprising the hagfishes and sea-lampreys, with pouch-like gills. The organization of these fishes is of a very low grade, as indicated chiefly by the persistent notochord without ossified vertebral centra, the absence of any traces of limbs, the absence of a mandible and of ribs, and the structure of the gills, which are sac-like and not ciliated. The heart consists of one auricle and one ventricle, but the branchial artery is not furnished with a bulbus arteriosus.

Marsupial (mār-sū'pi-al), a. [L. marsupium, Gr. marsipos, a pouch, a bag, a purse.] Pertaining to a bag or pouch; having a pouch; belonging to the order of marsupials.

Marsupialia (mār-sū'pi-al), n. One of the Marsupialia.

Marsupialia (mār-sū'pi-ā'li-a), n. pl. [L. marsupium, a pouch.] An extensive group of mammalia, differing from all others in their organization, and including genera which correspond to several orders of ordinary mammals. The most striking peculiarity is the absence of a placenta, and the consequent premature production of the fœtus, which immediately on its birth passes into a sort of second matrix. The skin of the animal is so arranged round the mamme as to form a pouch, in which not only the imperfect fœtus, attached to the nipple by its mouth, remains till fully developed, but into which, long after it is able to run about, it leaps when alarmed or when wishing to conceal itself. The marsupials link the mammals, through the Monotremata (which see), to the birds and reptiles. In marsupials the rectum opens in a distinct anus, but the two uteri with the ureters open into a urogenital canal. There are many genera both herbivorous and carnivorous. The kangaroo and opossum are familiar examples. The Marsupialia are divided into the following sections—Rhizophaga, including the rodent-like wombat; Poephaga, including the kangaroos, and kangaroo-rats or potoroos, all strictly phytophagous; the Carpophaga, of which the typical group is the Phalangistidæ or phalangers, so called because the second and third digits of the hind-feet are joined together almost to their extremities; the best known of the phalangers is the Australian opossum, which must not be confounded with the true or American opossums, which belong to another section of the Marsupialia, namely, the Entomophaga, in which are also the bandicoots, and the banded ant-eater; Sarcophaga, of which the best known species are Thylacinus cynocephalus, a native of Tasmania, and known by the colonists as the 'hyæna,' and the Dasyurus ursinus, also a native of Tasmania, where it is known as the 'Tasmanian devil.'

Marsupial—Virginian Opossum (Didelphys virginiana).

Marsupialian (mār-sū'pi-ā'li-an), a. Same as Marsupial.

Marsupian (mār-sū'pi-an), a. Same as Marsupial.

Marsupiate (mār-sū'pi-ā'ta), n. pl. Marsupialia (which see).

Marsupiate (mār-sū'pi-āt), a. Same as Marsupial.

Marsupiate (mār-sū'pi-āt), n. A marsupial; an individual of the Marsupialia.

Marsupiocrinites (mār-sū'pi-ō-kri-ni'tēz), n. A genus of Crinoidea, proposed by Prof. Phillips for some remarkable fossils noticed by Sir Roderick Murchison in the strata of the Silurian system. The arms are formed of two rows of calcareous plates.

Marsupite (mār-sū'pit), n. A fossil resembling a purse, the remains of a genus of free-floating Crinoidea found in the chalk formation.

Marsupium (mār-sū'pi-um), n. [L. a pouch or bag.] 1. The pouch in which marsupial mammals and the pipe-fish and sea-horses carry their young.—2. In med. a sack or bag with which any part is fomented.—3. A muscle in the eye of a hawk, the office of which is to flatten the cornea, enabling the bird to see to a great distance.

Mart (mārt), n. [Contr. from market.] 1. A place of sale or traffic; market.

Where has commerce such a mart
As London? Couper.

2. † Purchase and sale; bargain.

Now I play a merchant's part,
And venture madly on a desperate mart. Shak.

Mart† (mārt), v. t. To buy and sell; to traffic.

You yourself
Are much condemned to have an itching palm;
To sell and mart your offices for gold
To undeservers. Shak.

Mart (mārt), v. i. To trade dishonourably.

If he shall think it fit,
A saucy stranger in his court to mart
As in a Romish stew. Shak.

Mart† (mārt), n. 1. Mars, the god of war.

Come, both and with you bring triumphant Mart,
In loves and gentle jollies array'd,
After his murderous spoils. Spenser.

Hence.—2. War; warfare; battle; contest.

My father (on whose face he durst not look
In equal mart) by his fraud circumvented, Became his captive. Massinger.

Her dreadful weapon she to him address'd,
Which on his helm martell'd so hard. Spenser.

Martel-de-fer† (mār'tel-de-fer), n. [Fr., lit. a hammer of iron.] An ancient weapon having a kind of cross-head forming at one end a pick, and at the other a hammer, axe-blade, half-moon, or other termination. When used by horse-soldiers it was generally hung at the saddle-bow, and had a shorter handle than when used by infantry soldiers. Originally the form was that of a simple hammer, and some weapons of this kind were of considerable weight, as much as 25 lbs. being mentioned.

Martels-de-fer.

1. Horseman's hammer of about the time of Edward IV. 2. Martel-de-fer, time of Henry VIII. 3. Martel-de-fer, time of Edward VI. 4. Martel-de-fer with hand-gun, time of Queen Elizabeth.

Martello Tower (mār'tel'ō tou-ér), n. [The name originally given to towers erected by Charles V. on the coasts of Italy to defend them against pirates; because, on the appearance of a pirate-ship, warning was given by striking a bell with a hammer. It martello (see MARTEL); others say corrupted from Mortella in Corsica, where a tower of this kind made a strong resistance to an English naval force in 1794.] A small circular-shaped fort, with very thick walls, chiefly built to defend the seaboard. A number of such towers were built on the British coasts, especially in the south, in the time of Napoleon I. They are in two stages, the basement story containing store-rooms and magazine, the upper serving as a casemate for the defenders; the roof is shell-proof. The armament is a single heavy traversing gun.

Martello Tower, Eastbourne, Sussex.

Marten (mār'ten), n. Same as Martin.

Marten (mār'ten), n. [Older marten, Fr. martre, from D. marter.] A digitigrade carnivorous quadruped of the genus Mustela or Martes, family Mustelidæ. The beech-marten, common marten, or stone-marten (M. foina), is found in this country and in many localities on the continent of Pine-marten (Mustela Martes or Martes abietum).

Europe. It is about 19 inches long, exclusive of tail, which is 10 inches. The female breeds in hollow trees, and has two litters of from three to seven in the year. It is very destructive to game, poultry, eggs, &c., but it will sometimes feed on seeds and grain. Its fur, which is dense, long, and of a dull-brown colour, is used for making hats, muffs, &c. The pine-marten (Mustela martes or Martes martes) is an inhabitant of the woody districts in the northern parts of America, and is also found in Sweden, Norway, &c. Its fur is of a superior quality, and the skins form a great article of commerce.

Martes (már'téz). See MARTEN.

Mar-text (már'téks), n. A blundering or ignorant preacher.

Martial (már'shal), a. [L. martialis, from Mars, Martis, the god of war.] 1. Pertaining to war; suited to war; military; as, martial equipage; martial music; a martial appearance.

She is singing an air that is known to me,

A passionate ballad gallant and gay,

A martial song like a trumpet's call! Tennyson.

2. Given to war; warlike; brave; as, a martial nation or people.—3. Belonging to war, or to an army and navy; opposed to civil; as, martial law; a court martial.

They proceeded in a kind of martial justice.

4. Pertaining to or resembling the planet Mars.

The natures of the fixed stars are astrologically differentiated by the planets, and esteemed Martial or Jovial, according to the colours whereby they answer these planets. Sir T. Browne.

5. Having the properties of iron, called by the old chemists mars.—Martial law, an arbitrary kind of law, proceeding directly from the military power, and having no immediate constitutional or legislative sanction. When it is imposed upon any specified district, all the inhabitants and all their actions are brought within its dominion. It is founded on paramount necessity, extends to matters of civil as well as of criminal jurisdiction, and is proclaimed only in times of war, insurrection, rebellion, or other great emergency.

Martialism (már'shal-izm), n. The quality of being martial; bravery; martial exercises. Prince.

Marvel (már'vel), n. [Fr. merveille; It. meraviglia; O. It. mirabilia; L. mirabilia, wonderful things, from mirabilis, wonderful, from miror, to wonder, to look on with wonder.] 1. A wonder; that which arrests the attention and causes a person to stand or gaze or to pause.

Till I may deliver,

Upon the witness of these gentlemen,

This marvel to you. Shak.

2. Wonder; admiration; astonishment.

Use lessons marvel, it is said. Sir W. Scott.

—Marvel of Peru, the English name of the genus Mirabilis, nat. order Nyctaginaceæ. They are handsome plants, with tuberous roots, smooth leaves, and fragrant, tubular, red, white, or yellow flowers. M. dichotoma is the four-o'clock flower of the West Indies, from its blossoms expanding about that time. Another species, M. Jalapa, was at one time supposed to yield the jalap of commerce. The large and tuberous roots, when washed and dried and reduced to powder, form a substance similar to jalap, and possessing similar purgative properties. SYN. Wonder, admiration, astonishment, miracle, prodigy.

Marvel (már'vel), v. t. To wonder at.

Marvel (már'vel), v. t. pret. & pp. marvelled; ppr. marvelling. To be struck with surprise, astonishment, or admiration; to wonder.

the Coromandel coast for conveying passengers and goods between ships and the shore. They stand high out of the water, thus presenting a great surface to the wind—are difficult to manage, and sail slow; but they are well adapted for the purpose for which they are used, and sustain on the bars and shores shocks that would break up any European boat, the planks of which they are built being fastened together by cocconut fibres. They are rowed sometimes with as many as sixteen oars. As the boat approaches the shore, the boatmen watch the opportunity of a coming wave to pull the vessel high on the beach, where it is soon run up out of the reach of the next rolling wave. Called also Chelingue.

Masora (ma-sô'ra), n. [Heb. massorah, tradition, from masar, to hand down.] A Hebrew work on the Hebrew Scriptures, by several rabbins. It supplies the vowel points, besides a collection of critical, grammatical, and exegetical remarks. These comments, at first only handed down by tradition, or written on the margins of the different texts, do not seem to have been committed to writing in a collected form before the sixth century, and not to have been completed till the eighth or ninth century. The Masora is divided into the great and little; the former contains the whole collection in separate books; the latter is an abridgment or synopsis of the first. Written also Masorah, Massora, and Masorah.

Masoretic, Masoretical (ma-sô-ret'ik, ma-sô-ret'ik-al), a. Relating or belonging to the Masora, or the compilers of the Masora; as, masoretic points, that is, the vowel points furnished by the Masora.

Masorite (mas'ô-rî't), n. One of the writers of the Masora; one who adheres to the traditional readings of the Hebrew Scriptures.

Mass (mas), n. [Fr. masse, L. massa, a lump, from Gr. maza, a barley cake, from massô, to squeeze with the hands.] 1. A body of matter concentered, collected, or formed into a lump; a lump; applied to any solid body; as, a mass of iron or lead; a mass of flesh; a mass of ice; a mass of dough. 2. A collective body of fluid matter; as, the ocean is a mass of water.—3. A heap; a great quantity collected; an assemblage; as, a mass of treasure; a mass of foliage; a mass of light or shade.

He discovered to me the richest mines which the Spaniards have, and from whence all the mass of gold that comes into Spain is drawn. Sir W. Raleigh.

They lose their forms, and make a mass. Confus'd and black, if brought too near. Prior.

4. Bulk; magnitude. 'This army of such mass and charge.' Shak.—5. Gross body of things considered collectively; the body; sometimes, the main body; the bulk; as, the great mass of the people.

Comets have power over the gross and mass of things. Bacon.

6. In physics, the quantity of matter in any body, or the sum of all the material particles of a body. The mass of a body is estimated by its weight, whatever be its figure, or whether its bulk or magnitude be great or small. In mech. the mass multiplied into the intensity of gravity at the place constitutes the weight of the body; so that the weight being denoted by w, the mass by m, and the measure of gravity by g, then

$W = g.M$, and therefore $M = \frac{W}{g}$. This quantity

g, which is independent of the particular nature of the body, is thus the weight of what is arbitrarily assumed to represent the unit of mass. Also, if w represent the weight of the unit of volume, and v the volume of the body, then is $W = w.v$ and $M = \frac{w}{g}.v$.—The masses, the great body of the people, more especially of the working-class and lower orders; the populace.

Mass (mas), v.t. 1.† To strengthen, as a building for the purposes of fortification. Hayward.—2. To form into a mass; to collect into masses; to assemble in crowds.

But mass them together and they are terrible indeed. Coleridge.

Mass (mas), n. [A. Sax. mæsse, Fr. messe, Dan. and G. messe, L.L. missa, mass. The origin of the word is generally referred to the proclamation—'Ite; missa est.' 'Go; the assembly is dismissed' (L. missus, pp. of mittere, to send)—made in the ancient churches when the catechumens were dismissed after hearing as much of the service as they were allowed to hear, whereupon followed the communion service.] 1. A church service which forms an essential part of both the Roman Catholic and Greek Churches, and in which the consecration of the sacramental bread and wine takes place. In the R. Cath. Ch. the mass consists of four parts:—(a) The introitus or preparation, consisting of several prayers, psalms, the Gloria in Excelsis, the epistle and gospel for the day, the creed, &c. (b) The consecration of the bread and wine. (c) The communion. (d) The post-communion, which consists of a few more prayers, and of the blessing which the priest gives, turning towards the congregation.—2. The elaborate musical setting of certain portions of the mass, namely, the Kyrie, the Gloria, the Credo, the Sanctus, and the Agnus Dei; to which are sometimes added an Offertory and Benedictus.—High mass, a mass performed on festivals and other solemn occasions, by a priest or prelate, attended by a deacon and sub-deacon. On such occasions the mass, or parts of it, are sung by a choir, accompanied by the organ and other musical instruments.—Low mass, the ordinary mass performed by the priest, assisted by one altar-servant only.

Mass† (mas), v.i. To celebrate mass. Hooker.

Massacre (mas'sa-kér), n. [Fr.; L.L. mazacrum, probably from such a German word as L.G. matsken, matschken, to cut in pieces, or G. metzger, a butcher, metzen, metzern, to butcher, metzen, to cut to pieces; allied to O.G. metzan, gameizan, to cut down; Goth. marian, to cut or strike.] 1. The slaughter of numbers of human beings; the indiscriminate killing of human beings, especially without authority or necessity, and without forms civil or military.—2. Murder. [Rare.]

The tyrannous and bloody act is done, The most arch deed of piteous massacre, That ever yet this land was guilty of. Shak.

—Massacre of the innocents. See under INNOCENT, n.

Massacre (mas'sa-kér), v.t. pret. & pp. massacred; ppr. massacring. To kill with indiscriminate violence, and contrary to the usages of nations; to butcher; to slaughter; usually of killing human beings.

Massacrer (mas'sa-kér), n. One who massacres. 'Regicides, assassins, massacrers.' Burke.

Massage (mäs-áz), n. [Fr. from Gr. massein, to knead.] The therapeutic process of rubbing, pressing, stroking, slapping, or otherwise manipulating the flesh of parts of a person's body, as in inflammation of joints, neuralgic or other ailments, in order to effect a cure.

Massicot, Masticot (mas'si-kot, mas'ti-kot), n. [Fr. massicot.] Protioxide of lead or yellow oxide of lead, composed of one equivalent of lead and one equivalent of oxygen. Lead exposed to the air while melting is covered with a gray dusky pellicle. This pellicle carefully taken off is reduced by exposure to the joint action of heat and air to a greenish-gray powder, inclining to yellow. This oxide, separated from the grains of lead by sifting, and exposed to a more intense heat, sufficient to make it red-hot, assumes a deep yellow colour. In this state it is called massicot.

Massicot, slowly heated by a moderate fire, takes a beautiful red colour, becomes a salt composed of two equivalents protioxide of lead and one equivalent deutoxide, and obtains the name of minium. Massicot is sometimes used by painters, and it is used as a drier in the composition of ointments and plasters.

Massiness (mas'i-nes), n. The state of being massy; great weight, or weight with bulk; ponderousness.

Massive (mas'iv), a. [From mass; Fr. massif.] 1. Forming or consisting of a large mass; having great size and weight; heavy; weighty; ponderous. 'Massive weapon.' Horsley.—2. In mineral. Having a crystalline structure, but not a regular form as a whole; as, a mineral occurs massive.—Bulky, Massive, Massy. See under BULKY.

Yawning rocks in massy fragments fly. Pope.

—Bulky, Massive, Massy. See under BULKY.

Mass† (mast), n. [A. Sax. mæst; D. G. Sw. and Dan. mäst; hence, Fr. mât.] A long, round piece of timber or a hollow pillar of iron or steel, elevated or designed to be raised perpendicularly, or nearly so, on the keel of a ship or other vessel, and intended to support the yards, sails, and rigging in general. A mast is composed either of a single piece or of several pieces united by iron bands. When it is of several pieces it is called a built-mast or a made-mast. In all large vessels the masts are composed of several lengths, called lower, top, and top-gallant masts; sometimes there is a fourth, called a royal mast; a mast consisting of a single length is called a pole-mast. In a full-rigged ship with three masts, each of three pieces, the masts are distinguished as the foremast, the mainmast, and the mizzen-mast; and the pieces as the foremast (proper), foretopmast, foretop-gallant mast, &c.—To spend or expend a mast, to have a mast broken in foul weather.

Masted (mas'ted), a. Furnished with a mast or masts; having masts: chiefly used in composition; as, a three-masted vessel.

Master (mas'tér), n. [O. E. maister, maistre, O. Fr. maistre, from L. magister, master. See MAGISTER.] 1. One who is placed in authority; one who exercises the chief control over something or some one; one who rules, governs, or directs. More specifically: (a) one who has others under his immediate control; an employer; correlative to slave, servant, assistant, &c.; as, a man who owns slaves is their master; he who has servants is their master; he who has apprentices is their master. It is often used in such compounds as master-printer, master-builder, &c.

Our master and mistress seek you. Shak.
O thou my friend, my genius, come along,
Thou master of the poet and the song. Pope.
Nations that want protectors will have masters. Ames.

(b) One who has possession and the power of controlling or using at pleasure; the owner; proprietor. 'Prospero, master of a full poor cell.' Shak. 'Master of a hundred thousand drachmas.' Addison.

Let every man be master of his time. Shak.

Match-maker (mach'māk-ēr), n. One who makes matches for burning.

Match-maker (mach'māk-ēr), n. One who contrives or effects a union by marriage.

Match-making (mach'māk-ing), n. The act of making matches.

Match-making (mach'māk-ing), a. Tending to make matches; eager to make matches or bring about marriages.

Mingled with these groups were three or four match-making mammals.
Dickens.

Match-plane (mach'plān), n. Either of the two planes used in joining boards by grooving and tonguing, one plane, called the plough, being used to form the groove, and the other plane to form the corresponding tongue.

Match-tub (mach'tub), n. In old war-vessels, a tub having a cover perforated with holes, in which lighted slow matches were kept inverted, and in which there was water to extinguish sparks that might fall from the match.

Mate (māt), n. [In some, perhaps all, of its meanings another form of make, a mate. See MAKE, n.; comp. also O.D. maet, D. maet, companion, mate; perhaps from same root as E. mate, to measure, Goth. milan, to measure.] 1. One who customarily associates with another; a companion; an associate.—2. A husband or wife.

Mary took another mate.
Tennyson.

3. One of a pair of animals which associate for propagation and the care of their young.

4. A suitable companion; an equal; a match.

Your pride is yet no mate for mine.
Tennyson.

5. An officer in a ship whose duty is to assist the master or commander. In a merchant ship the mate, in the absence of the master, takes command of the ship. Large ships have a first, second, and third mate.—6. In general, a subordinate officer; an assistant; as, master's mate; surgeon's mate, &c.

Mate (māt), v.t. pret. & pp. mated; ppr. mat-ing. 1. To match; to marry.

The hind that would be mated by the lion
Must die for love.
Shak.

2. To match one's self against; to oppose as equal; to vie with; to cope with; to equal.

For thus the mastful chestnut mated the skies.
Dryden.

Mate (māt), n. [A contr. of checkmate (which see).] In chess, the state of the king when he is in check and cannot move out of check, the position by which the player whose king is so situated loses the game.

Like a stale at chess, where it is no mate but yet the game cannot stir.
Bacon.

Mate (māt), v.t. In chess, to checkmate (which see).

Mate (māt), v.t. [Fr. mater, to fatigue, enfeeble, from O. Fr. mat, worn out or exhausted, which is the same word as D. mat, G. matt, It. matto, Sp. Pg. mate, all from the chess term, Per. shāh māt = E. check-mate, lit. the king is dead.] To stupefy; to confound; to appal; to enervate; to subdue; to crush. 'Not mad but mated;' how, I do not know.'
Shak.

Audacity doth almost bind and mate the weaker sort of minds.
Bacon.

Twenty years of depression and continual failure mated the spirits of the cavaliers.
Hallam.

Mate† (māt), v.i. To be insensate.

Mate†, pp of mate. Dejected; crushed; struck dead. Chaucer.

Maté (mā'tā), n. [Properly yerba de maté, maté being originally the term applied in Brazil to the vessels, usually made of gourds or calabashes, in which the herb was infused for drinking.] The Paraguay name of the Ilex paraguayensis of botanists, or Brazilian holly, whose leaves are used extensively in South America as a substitute for tea.

Mateless (māt'les), a. Having no mate or companion. 'Some mateless dove.'
Peacham.

Matelote (mat'ē-lōt), n. [Fr., from matelot, a sailor.] A dish of food composed of many kinds of fish.

Mateology (mat-ē-ol-o-jī), n. [Gr. mataios, vain, and logos, discourse.] A vain discourse or inquiry. Bailey. [Rare.]

Mateotechny (mat'ē-o-tek'ni), n. [Gr. mataios, vain, and technē, art.] Any unprofitable science. [Rare.]

Mater (mā'tēr), n. [L.; one of those words that occur throughout the Indo-European or Aryan family. See MOTHER.] Mother. In anat. one of the two membranes that cover the cerebrum, cerebellum, medulla oblongata, and spinal cord, distinguished from each other by the epithets dura and pia. See DURA MATER, PIA MATER.—Mater aceti, mother of vinegar; a fungus or mould-plant which appears on the surface of vinegar, forming thereon a thick leather-like coat. It belongs to the genus Mycoderma.

Material (ma-tē'ri-al), a. [L. materialis, material, from materia, matter. See MATTER.]

1. Of or pertaining to matter; consisting of matter; not spiritual; as, material substance; material bodies. 'The material elements of the universe.' Whewell.—2. Pertaining to or affecting the physical nature of man, as distinguished from the moral or religious nature; relating to the bodily wants, interests, and comforts; as, the material well-being of a person.—3. Important; momentous; more or less necessary; having influence or effect.

I shall, in the account of simple ideas, set down only such as are most material to our present purpose. Locke.

The men of the north, for the sake of material interests, succumbed to a course of treatment which their more sturdy ancestors would not have endured from an English ministry. W. Chambers.

4. In logic, pertaining to the matter of a thing and not to the form.—5. Possessing sense or ideas; not empty-headed; full of matter. 'A material fool!' Shak. [Rare.] SYN. Corporeal, bodily, important, weighty, momentous, essential.

Material (ma-tē'ri-al), n. Anything composed of matter or possessing the fundamental properties of matter; the substance or matter of which anything is made, fabricated, or constructed; as, wool is the material of cloth; rags are the material of paper. The plural materials is often used in this sense; as, stones, bricks, timber, mortar, slates, &c., are the materials used in building.—Raw material, unmanufactured material; material in its natural state.

The currier and tanner find their whole occupation in converting raw material into what may be termed prepared material. F. S. Mill.

—Strength of materials, that power by which any substance, as a rod, bar, beam, chain, or rope, resists any effort to destroy the cohesion of its parts, whether by pulling or stretching, crushing, lateral or longitudinal pressure. The inquiry into the laws by which the materials employed in the construction of edifices or machines resist the strains to which they are subjected, is a branch of mechanical science of considerable importance, because upon a just adaptation of the strength at any one point to the strain there experienced (and an excess or deficiency of the former is nearly equally injurious) depends the stability of the whole.

Material† (ma-tē'ri-al), v. t. To materialize. Sir T. Browne.

Materialism (ma-tē'ri-al-izm), n. 1. The doctrine which denies the existence of any spiritual substance, and holds that the mind is mere matter, or a product of the material organization: opposed to spiritualism.

The irregular fears of a future state are supplanted by the materialism of Epicurus.

2. Matter; material substances in the aggregate. [Rare.]—3. The tendency to give undue attention and care to our material nature and its wants to the neglect of our spiritual.

Materialist (ma-tē'ri-al-ist), n. One who holds the doctrine of materialism.

He who denies spirit in man or in the universe is a perfect materialist. Flaming.

Materialistic, Materialistical (ma-tē'ri-al-ist'ik, ma-tē'ri-al-ist'ik-al), a. Relating to or partaking of materialism.

But to me his very spiritualism seemed more materialistic than his physics. Kingsley.

Materiality (ma-tē'ri-al'i-ti), n. The quality of being material: (a) material existence; corporeity; the fact of consisting of matter.

Spinoza, ever systematically consistent, pursued the doctrine to its inevitable consequence, the materiality of God. F. S. Mill.

It will be observed that Laplace's hypothesis goes entirely upon the materiality of heat, and is inconsistent with any vibratory theory. Wheat.

(b) Importance; as, the materiality of facts.

Materialize (ma-tē'ri-al-iz), v. t. pret. & pp. materialized; ppr. materializing. 1. To invest with matter; to reduce to a state of matter; to make material.—2. To regard as matter, or as proceeding from or dependent on matter; to explain by the laws appropriate to matter; as, to materialize thought, ideas, life, and the like.

Materializing (ma-tē'ri-al-iz-ing), a. Directed towards materialism.

As the perception of a spiritual Deity can only be through the mind or the spirit, the mystery might seem more profound according to this view, which, while it repudiated the materializing tendencies of the former system, by its more clear and logical idealism kept up by the strong distinction between God and created things, between the human and divine mind, the all-pervading soul and the soul of man. Mitman.

Materially (ma-tē'ri-al-li), adv. In a material manner: (a) In the state of matter. (b) Not formally; substantially.

An ill intention is certainly sufficient to spoil and corrupt an act in itself materially good. South.

(c) In an important manner or degree; essentially.

Whatever may be thought of the effect which the study of the law had upon the rights of a subject, it conducted materially to the security of good order by ascertaining the hereditary succession of the crown. Hallam.

Materialness (ma-tē'ri-al-nes), n. The state or quality of being material; importance.

Materia Medica (ma-tē'ri-a med'i-ka), n. [L.] 1. The name given to that branch of medical science which treats of the various substances, natural and artificial, which are employed in the practice of medicine, and embraces an explanation of the nature and modes of action of those substances to which recourse is had in the cure of disease, and which are usually called medicines. Thus defined, it includes both pharmacology and therapeutics.—2. A general term for all the curative substances employed in medicine.

Materialian† (ma-tē'ri-ā'n-ri-an), n. A materialist. Cudworth.

Materialiate, Materialized (ma-tē'ri-āt, ma-tē'ri-āt-ed), a. [L. materialis, pp. of materio, to build of matter. See MATERIAL.] Consisting of matter. Bacon. [Rare.]

Materialiate† (ma-tē'ri-āt), n. A material substance; a thing formed of matter.

Materialiation† (ma-tē'ri-ā'shon), n. The act of forming matter. Sir T. Browne.

Matériel (ma-tā'ri-el), n. [Fr. See MATERIAL.] That in a complex system which constitutes the materials or instruments employed, as the baggage, munitions, provisions, &c., of an army, in distinction from the personnel, or the men; or the buildings, libraries, and apparatus of a college, in distinction from its officers.

Materialous† (ma-tē'ri-us), a. Same as Material. Milton.

Maternal (ma-tēr'nal), a. [L. maternus, from mater, mother. See MATER.] Pertaining to a mother; becoming a mother; motherly; as, maternal love; maternal tenderness.

Maternally (ma-tēr'nal-li), adv. In a maternal or motherly manner.

Maternity (ma-tēr'n-i-ti), n. [Fr. maternité, from L. maternus. See MATERNAL, MATER.] The state, character, or relation of a mother.—Maternity hospital, a hospital for the reception of women about to give birth to children.

Matfelon (ma'tfel-on), n. [O. Fr. matfelon.] A plant, Centaurea nigra; knapweed.

Matgrass (mat'gras), n. A grass (Nardus stricta) which grows abundantly on moors and heaths in short tufts. It is worthless for agricultural purposes, except as a natural pasture for sheep.

Math (math), n. [A. Sax. math, māth, from mdwan, to mow. See MOW.] A mowing, or what is gathered from mowing; used chiefly in composition; as, aftermath.

The first mowing thereof, for the king's use, is wont to be sooner than the common math. Bp. Hall.

Mathematic (ma-thē-mat'ik), a. Same as Mathematical, but less common.

Mathematical (ma-thē-mat'ik-al), a. [L. mathematicus. See MATHEMATICS.] 1. Pertaining to mathematics; as, mathematical knowledge; mathematical instruments.—2. According to the principles of mathematics; theoretically precise; very accurate; strict; rigid; as, mathematical exactness.

Mathematically (ma-thē-mat'ik-al-li), adv. In a mathematical manner; according to the laws or principles of mathematical science; with mathematical certainty; demonstrably.

Mathematician (ma'thē-mat'i'shan), n. [Fr. mathématicien. See MATHEMATICS.] One versed in mathematics.

Mathematics (ma-thē-mat'iks), n. [L. mathematica; Gr. mathematikē (technē, art, understood, from math, root of manthano, mathēsomai, to learn.) The science that treats of the properties and relations of quantities; the science in which known relations between quantities are subjected to certain processes which enable other relations to be deduced. This science (or group of sciences) is divided into pure, which considers quantity abstractly, without relation to matter, and comprehends such branches as arithmetic, geometry, algebra, trigonometry, the differential and integral calculus, and quaternions; and mixed, which treats of magnitude as subsisting in material bodies, and is consequently interwoven with physical considerations, physical subjects being investigated and explained by mathematical reasoning. This branch comprehends mechanics, astronomy, optics, &c. These are sometimes called the physico-mathematical sciences. The science of mathematics is also distinguished into speculative and practical: in the former, the properties and relations of numbers and magnitudes are contemplated; in the latter, the knowledge of those properties and relations is applied to the solution of problems, and to a variety of practical purposes. [Names of sciences ending in ics, as mathematics, physics, metaphysics, mechanics, optics, ægeetics, hermeneutics, &c., although in appearance plural, and in some cases really formed from old singulars (mathematic, mechanic, metaphysic, &c.), are now generally treated as singular, and connected with singular verbs and pronouns. It is probable that the plural form was introduced to indicate the complex nature of these sciences. The Germans and French still write such words in the singular, and we also have retained a number of similar words in the singular, as, arithmetic, logic, music, rhetoric, magic, &c. The singulars physic, metaphysic, &c., are also sometimes used for the more common plural forms.]

Mathemeg (math'é-meg), n. A fish of the cod kind, inhabiting Hudson's Bay.

Mather (mæθ'ér), n. Same as Madder.

Mathes (ma'thez), n. An herb: a kind of chamomile.

Mathesis (ma-thé'sis), n. [Gr. mathēsis, learning, from math, the stem of manthano, to learn, to understand. See MATHEMATICS.] Mental discipline; learning or science in general, especially mathematics. Pope.

Maticin, Maticine (mat'i-sin), n. A bitter principle obtained from the plant matico.

Matico (ma-tē'kō), n. The Spanish name of Piper angustifolium, nat. order Piperaceæ. In Peru it has long enjoyed a high reputation for its styptic properties, and it has been introduced into this country to arrest hæmorrhages, to check other discharges, such as the profuse expectoration and also the night-sweats of consumptive patients. A species of Eupatorium (E. glutinosum) has the same name and similar properties.

Matin (mat'in), a. [Fr. matin; It. mattino, morning, from L. matutinus, pertaining to the morning.] Pertaining to the morning; used in the morning.

Up rose the victor angels, and to arms
The matin trumpet sung. Milton.

Matin (mat'in), n. 1. † Morning.

The glow-worm shows the matin to be near,
And 'gins to pale his uneffectual fire. Shak.

2. pl. Morning worship or service; morning prayers or songs.

The vigils are celebrated before them, and the nocturn and matins, for the saints whose the relics are. Stillingfleet.

The winged choristers began
To chirp their matins. Cleaveland.

The music and the sprightly scene
Invite us; shall we quit our road and join
These festive matins. Wordsworth.

3. pl. Time of morning service; the first canonical hour in the Romish Church.

Matinal (mat'in-al), a. 1. Relating to the morning or to matins.—2. A term applied by Prof. H. Rogers to the third of his fifteen subdivisions of the Palæozoic strata in the Appalachian chain of North America, the names of which suggest metaphorically the different natural periods of the day; it corresponds to a certain extent with our upper Cambrians.

Matin-dog (mat'in-dog), n. A large kind of dog, allied to the Danish dog, but now scarcely seen except in France, where it is supposed to have been introduced from the north.

Matinée (mat-in-ā), n. [Fr. from matin, morning.] An entertainment or reception held early in the day.

Matre,† Matere,† n. Matter. Chaucer.

Matrass (mat'ras), n. [Fr. matras, a matrass; also, an arrow, a javelin, from L. materis, mataris, matarā, a Celtic javelin, a pike—of Celtic origin: so called from its long, straight, narrow neck.] A chemical vessel in the shape of an egg, or with a tapering neck open at the top, serving the purposes of digestion, evaporation, &c.; a cucurbit. It is now superseded by the Florence flask.

ch, chain; ch, Sc. lock; g, go; j, job;

n, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

Matricaria (mat-ri-kā'ri-a), n. [From L. matris, matricis, the womb, from the plant's supposed medicinal properties.] A genus of plants of the nat. order Compositae. They are annual (rarely perennial), branched herbs, with much-divided leaves and yellow heads with white rays, the receptacle being conical, elongated, and flat-topped. There are about seventy species, natives of Europe, North and South Africa, and Western Asia. M. Chamomilla, or wild chamomile, is a British plant, resembling common chamomile in its flowers and smell, and common feverfew in its properties. It grows in cultivated and waste ground. The genus has its name from the supposed efficacy of some of its species in curing disorders of the uterus.

Matricate (mā'tris), n. Same as Matris.

Matricidal (mat'ri-sid-al), a. Pertaining to matricide.

Matricide (mat'ri-sid), n. [L. matricidium —mater, matris, mother, and cedo, to slay.] The killing or murder of one's mother.

Matricide (mat'ri-sid), n. [L. matricida.] The killer or murderer of one's mother.

Matriculate (ma-trik'ū-lāt), v. t. pret. and pp. matriculated; ppr. matriculating. [L. matricula, a public register, dim. of matris, matricis, a womb, a female kept for breeding, the parent stem, a public register, from mater, a mother.] To enter in a register; to register; to enrol; especially, to enter or admit to membership in a body or society, particularly in a college or university, by enrolling the name in a register.

In discovering and matriculating the arms of commissaries from North America. Sir W. Scott.

Matriculate (ma-trik'ū-lāt), v. i. To be entered as a member of any body or society, as a college, by having one's name entered in a register.

Matriculate (ma-trik'ū-lāt), a. Matriculated; admitted; enrolled.

Matriculate (ma-trik'ū-lāt), n. One who is matriculated or enrolled in a register, and thus admitted to membership in a society.

Matriculation (ma-trik'ū-lā'shon), n. The act of matriculating, or of registering a name and admitting to membership.

Matrimonial (mat-ri-mō'ni-al), a. [L. matrimonialis, pertaining to marriage. See MATRIMONY.] 1. Pertaining to marriage; connubial; nuptial; hymeneal; as, matrimonial rights or duties.—2. Derived from marriage.

If he (Henry VII.) relied upon that title, he could be but a king at courtesy, and have rather a matrimonial than a regal power. Bacon.

—Matrimonial causes, in law, suits for the redress of injuries respecting the rights of marriage. In England they were formerly a branch of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, but are now dealt with in one of the divisions of the High Court of Justice.—SYN. Connubial, conjugal, sponsal, nuptial, hymeneal.

Matrimonially (mat-ri-mō'ni-al-li), adv. In a matrimonial manner; according to the manner or laws of marriage.

Matrimonious (mat-ri-mō'ni-us), a. Matrimonial. 'Foreseeing the miserable work that man's ignorance and pusillanimity would make in this matrimonious business.' Milton. [Rare and obsolete.]

Matrimony (mat'ri-mo-ni), n. [L. matrimonium, from mater, matris, a mother.] 1. Marriage; wedlock; the union of man and woman for life; the nuptial state.

If any of you know cause or just impediment why these two persons should not be joined together in holy matrimony, ye are to declare it. Common Prayer.

2. Wife. [Compare wedlock in same sense.] 'Restore my matrimony undefiled.' Beau. & Fl. [Rare.]—3. A game with cards.—4. A name given jocularly to raisins and almonds nixed, and various other common combinations.—MARRIAGE, Wedding, Nuptials, Matrimony, Wedlock. See under MARRIAGE.

Matrix (mā'triks), n. pl. Matrices (mā'tris-ēz). [L. matrix, from mater, mother.] 1. The womb; the cavity in which the fetus of an animal is formed and nourished till its birth.

All that openeth the matrix is mine. Ex. xxxiv. 19. Hence—2. That which incloses anything, or gives origin to anything, like a womb; as, (a) a mould; as, the matrix of a type. (b) In mining and geol. the rock or main substance in which any accidental crystal, mineral, or fossil is embedded. In mining, same as GANG, 3. (c) In osteology, the formative portion of a mammalian tooth, consisting of a pulp and capsule; the former is converted into dentine, the latter into cement.—3. In dyeing, one of the five simple colours, black, white, blue, red, and yellow, combinations of which are used to form some compound colour.—4. In math. any rectangular arrangement of symbols. Thus $$\begin{array}{cccc} a_1 & b_1 & c_1 & d_1 \\ a_2 & b_2 & c_2 & d_2 \\ a_3 & b_3 & c_3 & d_3 \end{array}$$ is a rectangular matrix consisting of four columns and three lines or rows.

Matron (mā'tron), n. [Fr. matrone; L. matrona, a married woman, wife, from mater, mother.] 1. A married woman, especially an elderly married woman, or a woman of years sufficient to be the mother of a family, whether actually so or not; a woman possessing the gravity suitable to a mother. 'Grave from her cradle, inasmuch that she was a matron before she was a mother.' Fuller.—2. In a special sense, a head nurse in a hospital; the female head or superintendent of any institution.—Jury of matrons, in law, a jury of 'discreet and lawful women' impanelled to try whether a widow, who alleges herself to be with child by her late husband, is pregnant, and if so, to ascertain the time of conception and that of the expected delivery. A jury of matrons is also summoned to inquire into the fact of pregnancy in cases where a woman convicted of treason or felony, upon sentence of death being pronounced, pleads, in stay of execution, that she is with child.

Matronage (mā'tron-āj), n. 1. The state of a matron.—2. Matrons collectively.

Can a politician slight the feelings and convictions of the whole matronage of his country? Have.

Matronal (mā'tron-al), a. [L. matronalis, from matrona. See MATRONE.] Pertaining to a matron; suitable to an elderly lady or to a married woman; grave; motherly. 'The widow of Ferdinand the younger, being then of matronal years of seven-and-twenty.' Bacon.

Matronhood (mā'tron-hūd), n. State of a matron. Miss Jeusbury.

Matronize (mā'tron-iz), v. t. 1. To render matronlike.

Childbed matronizes the giddiest spirits. Richardson.

2. To act as a mother to; to chaperon; as, she wants to matronize me in the streets.

Matronlike (mā'tron-lik), a. Having the manners of an elderly woman; grave; sedate; becoming a matron. 'Matronlike both manners and attire.' Sir J. Harrington.

Matronly (mā'tron-li), a. Elderly; advanced in years; becoming a wife or matron. 'Painting, polishing, and pruning, beyond a matronly comeliness or gravity.' Jer. Taylor.

Matross (mat'ros'), n. [D. matroos, Dan. and Sw. matros, G. matrose, a sailor, perhaps from D. maat, a mate.] Formerly, one of the soldiers in a train of artillery, who were next to the gunners, and assisted them in loading, firing, and sponging the guns. They carried firelocks, and marched with the store-waggons as guards and assistants.

Mattachin, Matachin (mat'a-chén), n. [Sp. matachin, a dance by grotesquely dressed figures.] A dance with swords in which the performers fenced and struck at each other as in real contest, receiving the blows on their bucklers.—To dance a mattachin, to fight a duel.

I'd dance a matachin with you, Should make you sweat your best blood forth, I would. And, it may be, I will. Beau. & Fl.

Mattamore (mat'ta-mór), n. [Fr. matamore, from Ar. metmur, a ditch, a cavern, or other subterranean place, in which corn is laid up.] In the East, a subterranean repository for wheat.

Matt, Matte (mat), n. [G. matt, dim. dull.] A mass of imperfectly reduced metal, containing various impurities.

Matte (mat'tā), n. Paraguay tea. See MATE.

Matter (mat'ér), n. [O.E. mattere, matere, O.Fr. matere, Fr. matière, from L. materia, matter, from root of mother.] 1. Body; substance extended; anything perceptible by any of the senses; that of which the whole sensible universe is composed. Matter is usually divided into three kinds or classes: solid, liquid, and aeriform or gaseous. Solid substances are those whose parts firmly cohere and resist impression, as wood or stone; liquids have free motion among their parts, and easily yield to impression, as water and wine. Aeriform or gaseous substances are elastic fluids, called vapours and gases, as air and oxygen.—2. The content of any speech or writing; the thing said; the meaning; sense; substance.

I do not much dislike the matter, but The manner of his speech. Shak.

3. In logic and metaph. that which forms the subject of any mental operation, as distinguished from the form, which is that which constitutes the nature of the operation itself, as in the act of conception all that goes to form the concept 'man', for example, is the matter of that concept, while the mode in which the mind works to produce that concept is the form; and in the act of imagination all that is united in an imaginative representation of 'a centaur' is the matter of that act, the form being the manner in which the mind works as often as it imagines.

The term matter is usually applied to whatever is given to the artist, and consequently, as given, does not come within the province of the art itself to supply. The form is that which is given in and through the proper operation of the art. In sculpture the matter is the marble in its rough state as given to the sculptor; the form is that which the sculptor in the exercise of his art communicates to it. The distinction between matter and form in any mental operation is analogous to this. The former includes all that is given to, the latter all that is given by, the operation. Dean Mansel.

4. Good sense; substance, as opposed to empty verbosity or frivolous jesting. 'To speak all mirth and no matter.' Shak.—5. Subject; thing treated; that about which we write or speak; that which employs thought or excites emotion; as, this is matter of praise, of gratitude, or of astonishment.

Hail, Son of God! Saviour of men! Thy name Shall be the copious matter of my song. Milton.

6. Affair; business; event; course of things; as, matters have succeeded well thus far; observe how matters stand; thus the matter rests at present; thus the matter ended.

To help the matter, the alchemists call in many vanities out of astrology. Bacon.

If the matter should be tried by duel between two champions, the victory should go on the one side. Bacon.

7. Cause or occasion of any event, as of any disturbance, or of a disease, or of a difficulty; obsolete except in the phrase, what is the matter?

And this is the matter why interpreters in that passage in Hosea will not consent it to be a true story, that the prophet took a harlot to wife. Milton.

8. Import; consequence; importance; moment.

A prophet some, and some a poet cry; No matter which, so neither of them lie. Dryden.

9. Thing, in a very general sense.

What impossible matter will he make easy next? Shak.

10. Indefinite amount, quantity, or portion. I have thoughts to tarry a small matter. Congreve. Away he goes to the market-town, a matter of seven miles. Sir R. L'Estrange.

11. In printing, (a) manuscript to be set up in type; copy. (b) Type set up and ready to be used in printing.—12. [In this special sense our word corresponds with Fr. matière, D. G. materie, *Sp. Maximist (maks'im-ist), n. One who deals in maxims.

Maximization (maks-i-mi-zā'shon), n. The act or process of maximizing, or raising to the highest degree. Bentham. [Rare.]

Maximize (maks'im-iz), v.t. To make as great as possible; to increase to the highest degree. Bentham; Owen.

Maxim-monger (maks'im-mung-gēr), n. One who deals much in maxims; a sententious person.

Maximum (maks'i-mum), n. [L., from maximus, greatest, superlative of magnus, great.] The greatest quantity or degree fixed, attainable, or attained, in any given case, as opposed to minimum, the smallest.

Good legislation is the art of conducting a nation to the maximum of happiness, and the minimum of misery. Colquhoun.

—Maxima and minima, in math, and physics, the greatest and least values of a variable quantity. The method of finding these greatest and least values is called the method of maxima and minima, which forms one of the most interesting inquiries in the modern analysis. Maxima and minima, however, are used to imply not the absolute greatest and least values of a varying quantity, but the values which it has at the moment when it ceases to increase and begins to decrease, and vice versa.—Maximum thermometer, a thermometer so constructed as to indicate the highest temperature during a day or during any given space of time, or since its last adjustment.

Maximum (maks'i-mum), a. Greatest; as, the maximum velocity.

May (mä), n. [Fr. mai, Pr. mai, May, from L. Maivs, from the goddess Maia, a goddess of growth or increase, from root of L. magnus, great. See MAY, v. auxiliary.] 1. The fifth month of the year: sometimes used metaphorically for the early part of life.

His May of youth and bloom of lusthood. Shak.

2. Hawthorn blossom: so named because the hawthorn blooms about the end of May (old style).

But when at last I dared to speak,
The lanes, you know, were white with may. Tennyson.

May (mä), v.i. To celebrate the festivities of May-day: used only as a participial noun in such phrases as to be a maying, to go a maying.

Life went a maying
With Nature, Hope, and Poesy when I was young. Coleridge.

May (mä), verb auxiliary; pret. might. [A. Sax. magan, to be able, to avail, to be in health, to be sufficient; pres. 1 and 3, mæg; 2, meaht, miht, pl. māgon; pret. meahte, mihte; O. Sax. mugan, L. G. and D. mogen, Goth. and O. H. G. magan, G. mögen, Icel. mega, Dan. maa, to be able. Akin to E. much, mickle, maid, L. magnus, Gr. megas, Skr. mahā, great.] The word may denotes (a) primarily, subjective ability, or absolute possibility.

For your desire to know what is between us,
O'ermaster't as you may. Shak.

That very time I saw, but thou couldst not,
Flying between the cold moon and the earth,
Cupid all armed: a certain aim he took
At a fair vestal throned by the west,
And loosed his love-shaft smartly from his bow,
As it should pierce a hundred thousand hearts;
But I might see young Cupid's fiery shaft
Quench'd in the chaste beams of the watery moon. Shak.

For what he (the king) may do is of two kinds:
what he may do as just, and what he may do as possible. Bacon.

[This use of the word may is now almost if not quite given up, can taking its place, and may being for the most part confined to those cases in which contingency is expressed, that is, those in which something is contemplated as possibly, but only possibly, true, or happening or about to happen, or as having possibly happened.] (b) Possibility with contingency.

A score of good ewes may be worth ten pounds. Shak.
May be he will relent. Shak.

Immense sums have been expended on works which, if a rebellion broke out, might perish in a few hours. Macaulay.

Sometimes may is used in this way merely to avoid too great bluntness in putting a question, or to suggest doubt as to whether the person to whom the question is addressed will be able to answer it definitely.

How old may Phillis be, you ask,
Whose beauty thus all hearts engages. Prior.

Sometimes the past tense might is similarly used, with no other difference than that of imparting a certain flavour of contempt to the question.

Who might be your mother,
That you insult, exult, and all at once,
Over the wretched? Shak.

Hence, (c) Opportunity; moral power—the contingency residing in the will of some free agent.

I'll yield him thee asleep,
Where thou mayst knock a nail into his head. Shak.

(d) Permission.

An I may hide my face, let me play Thisby too. Shak.

Thou mayst be no longer steward. Luke xvi. 2.

I might not be admitted. Shak.
[In this sense may is scarcely used now in negative clauses, as permission refused amounts to an absolute prohibition, and accordingly removes all doubt or contingency.] (e) Desire, as in prayer, aspiration, imprecation, benediction, and the like.

May you live happily and long for the service of your country. Dryden.

(f) May is frequently used to form the compound tenses of the subjunctive mood. Nearly all the examples of this kind might be referred to the head (b), for the word may in such cases can seldom be held to express more than contingency, although it may occur in clauses in which the context or the conjunction that introduces the clause indicates that something additional, as a concession, or a purpose, is expressed. May is so used (1) in substantive clauses, or clauses that take the place of or are in apposition with the subject or object or predicate of a sentence: introduced by that.

It was my secret wish that he might be prevailed on to accompany me. Byron.

They apprehended that he might have been carried off by gipsies. Southey.

(2) In conditional clauses. [Rare, except in clauses where permission is distinctly expressed.]

Lands, goods, horse, armour, anything I have Is his to use, so Somerset may die. Shak.

(3) In concessive clauses.

Whatever the stars may have betokened, this August, 1749, was a momentous month to Germany.

G. H. Lewes.

(4) In clauses expressing a purpose.

Constantius had separated his forces that he might divide the attention and resistance of the enemy. Gibbon.

May (mä), n. [A. Sax. mæg, a maid, a woman.

Fäte, fär, fat, fäll; më, met, hër; pine, pin; nôte, not, möve; tûbe, tub, bull;

May-bush (mā'būsh), n. The hawthorn.

May-day (mā'dā), n. The first day of May: so called in England, by way of eminence, in commemoration of the festivities which from a very early period were universally, and in many parts of the country are still observed on that day. The chief features of the celebration are the gathering of hawthorn blossom and other flowers, the crowning of the May-queen, dancing round the May-pole, &c.

May-dew (mā'dū), n. The dew of May, which is said to have great virtue in whitening linen, and to have also other remarkable properties. It is still the practice among young people in some parts of the country to go out into the fields in the morning of the first of May, and bathe their faces with May-dew under the impression that it preserves beauty.

May-duke (mā'dūk), n. [A corruption of Médoc, a place in France in the Gironde, from which these cherries were introduced.] A variety of the common cherry.

May-flower (mā'flou-ēr), n. A flower that appears in May; in England, the hawthorn; in New England, the trailing arbutus (Epi-gaea repens).

May-fly (mā'flī), n. The popular name of the Stilb tentaria, a neuropterous insect produced during the spring months in large numbers. It is of a dull brown, and may be found on walls or palings near water. The name is also applied to various insects of the genus Ephemera.

May-game (mā'gām), n. Sport or diversion; play, such as is used on the first of May.

Not a May-game is this man's life. Carlyle.

Mayhap (mā'hāp), adv. Peradventure; it may happen; perhaps.

Mayhem (mā'hēm), n. In law, the act of depriving a man of a member necessary for defence in fight. See MAM.

May-lady (mā'lā-di), n. The queen or lady of May, in old May games.

May-lily (mā'lī-lī), n. The lily of the valley (Convallaria majalis). See LILY.

May-morn (mā'morn), n. Morning of May-day; sometimes used metaphorically in the sense of freshness; vigour.

My thrice-punish liege

Is in the very May-morn of his youth. Shak.

Mayonnaise, Mayonaise (mā-on-āz), n. A dish composed of yolks of eggs and salad-oil beat together to the consistence of a syrup, and seasoned with salt, vinegar, pepper, garlic, &c. It serves as a sauce to lobster, salmon, &c.

Mayor (mā'ēr), n. [Fr. maire, from L. major, greater.] The chief magistrate of a city or borough; the chief officer of a municipal corporation.—Mayor of the palace, in France, originally the first officer of the royal household, then the first officer of state, under the Merovingian kings. Gradually these officials aggrandized their own influence to the detriment of that of the monarchs, till the latter ruled only nominally, all real power being usurped by the mayors. Ultimately, in the year 752, Pépin the Short, mayor of the palace to Childeric IV., procured the deposition of that king, and himself ascended the throne, founding the Carolingian dynasty.

Mayoralty (mā'ēr-al-tī), n. The office of a mayor, and the time of his service.

For the last four years, ever since his second mayoralty, he had arrogated to himself the dignity of a chair. Lord Lytton.

Mayoress (mā'ēr-es), n. The wife of a mayor.

Mayorship (mā'ēr-ship), n. The office or dignity of a mayor.

May-pole (mā'pōl), n. A pole wreathed or otherwise adorned with flowers and set up to be danced round on May-day.

May-queen (mā'kwēn), n. A young woman crowned with flowers and honoured as queen at the games held on May-day.

May-weed (mā'wēd), n. A British plant of the genus Anthemis (A. Cotula), nat. order Compositae. It is a troublesome weed in corn, and difficult to eradicate. It has daisy-like flowers, finely divided leaves, and an unpleasant smell, and sometimes blisters the hands of reapers.

Mazagan (maz-a-gan), n. [From Mazagan, a town in Morocco, near which it grows wild.] A small and early variety of the common bean (Faba vulgaris).

Mazard, Mazzard (maz'ārd), n. [Probably another form of mazer, the head being compared to a bowl; comp. Fr. tête, from L. testa, a jar, and it. zucca, which means first a gourd, then a goblet, and finally the skull.] 1. † The head; the skull; sometimes, the jaw.

Your brave acquaintance

That gives you ale, so fortified your mazard,

That there's no talking to you. Beau. & Fl.

2. A black cherry in good esteem for making cherry brandy.

Mazard† (maz'ārd), v.t. To knock on the mazard or head.

If I had not been a spirit, I had been mazzarded.

B. Jonson.

Mazarine-gown (maz-a-rēn'goun), n. A common councilman's gown of mazarine or deep blue colour.

Maze (māz), n. [Formerly written mase, and having such meanings as error, confused throng, wild fancy, &c.; probably allied to Prov. E. mazole, to wander as if stupefied; comp. also Icel. masa, to chatter or prattle. The word might also be connected with W. masu, to swoon, masarod, a swoon. Amaze is from this word.] 1. A baffling and confusing net-work of paths or passages; a winding and turning; perplexed state of things; intricacy; a state that embarrasses; an intricacy; a labyrinth.

The ways of heaven are dark and intricate,
Puzzled with mazes and perplex'd with error.

Addison.

Expatriate free o'er all this scene of man,

A mighty maze! but not without a plan. Pope.

2. Confusion of thought; perplexity; uncertainty.

I have thrust myself into this maze,
Haply to wive and thrive as best I may. Shak.

Maze (māz), v.t. [See the noun.] To confound with intricacy; to bewilder; to amaze.

They so mazed and stupefied his conscience, that it lay, as it were, in a swoon. South.

Mazet (māz), v.i. To be bewildered.

Mazedness† (māz'ed-nes), n. The condition of being mazed; confusion; astonishment. Chaucer.

Mazeful† (māz'ful), a. Causing amazement; wonderful.

Ye wonder at that sight,

And stand astonish'd like to those which red Medusae mazedful. Spenser.

Mazer† (māz'ēr), n. [O. Fr. and O. E. mazarin, mazerin, a drinking-vessel, so called probably from being made originally of the spotted wood of the maple; from O. Fr. mazre, spotted wood, or A. Sax. maser, a maple (from its spotted wood); O. H. G. masar, N. H. G. maser, a knur or excrescence on a tree, also a spot in wood; O. H. G. māsa, N. H. G. mase, a spot.] A cup or large goblet, generally of valuable material.

All that Hybla's hives do yield

Were into one broad mazer fill'd. B. Jonson.

Mazi (mā'zi), n. The Turkish name for galls. Simmonds.

Mazily (māz'i-lī), adv. In a mazy manner; in a winding or turning manner; with confusion or perplexity.

Not like those mazyly cut Valentines one sees in the windows. Stirley Brook.

Maziness (māz'i-nes), n. The state of being mazy or mazed; perplexity.

Mazological (mā-zō-loj'ik-al), a. Pertaining to mazology.

Mazologist (mā-zō-lo-jist), n. One versed in mazology.

Mazology (mā-zol'o-jī), n. [Gr. maza, a breast, and logos, a discourse.] That department of zoology which treats of mammiferous animals.

Mazurka, Mazourka (ma-zūr'ka), n. 1. A lively Polish round dance in $\frac{3}{4}$ or $\frac{3}{8}$ time, and generally danced by four or eight pairs. It is quicker than the Polonaise.—2. The music written for this dance.

Mazy (māz'i), a. Having the character of a maze; perplexed with turns and windings; winding; intricate; as, mazy error. 'To . . . trace the mazy round.' Dryden.

Mazzard (maz'ārd), n. Same as Mazard.

Me (mē), pron. pers. [A. Sax. mē (acc. and dat.), G. nich (acc.), mīr (dat.); so also Goth. mik, mis, L. me, mihi, Gr. eme, emoi, Skr. mām, mahyam, all me, and to me.] The oblique cases (accusative and dative) of I, the pronoun of the first person. Although generally now an accusative, there are several uses in which it still stands as a dative; as, (1) before the impersonal verb methinks, it appears to be; (2) after interjections; as, woe is me (comp. well is him); (3) to express the indirect object; as, give me a drink, shoot me a hare, where me is to or for me. In this last use it is often a mere expletive in Elizabethan writers, having no proper pronominal significance, but merely serving to give life or grace to the expression. In the following extract both me and them are datives; but while me is redundant, them has its proper pronominal force.

He plucked me ope his doublet and offered them his throat to cut. Shak.

In old English we find the dative construed before the verb to be and an adjective, me were leof = it would be lief (preferable) to me. Traces of this idiom are to be found in Shakspeare.

Me rather had my heart might feel your love

Than my unpleasant eye see your courtesy. Rich. II. iii. 3.

This corresponds to old English 'me were lefer' = I had liefer. [As a dative me has lost a suffix -r, as an accusative the suffix -c. Comp. G. nir, nich.]

Meacock† (mē'kok), n. [Probably from meek and suffix -ock.] An uxorious, effeminate man; a timorous, cowardly fellow.

A meacock is he who dreads to see bloodshed.

Mtr. for Megs.

Meacock† (mē'kok), a. Tame; timorous; cowardly.

'Tis a world to see

How tame, when men and women are alone,

A meacock wretch can make the curstest shrew. Shak.

Mead (mēd), n. [A. Sax. meðu, meodu, medo; a word widely spread through the Indo-European family of languages. Comp. D. mede, Icel. mjóthr, Dan. mjød, Sw. mjöd, W. medd, Ir. meadh, mead; Gr. methy, wine; Slav. med, Lith. medus, Rus. med, mead, Skr. madhu, honey.] 1. A fermented liquor made by dissolving one part of honey in three of boiling water, flavouring it with spices and adding a portion of ground malt and a piece of toast dipped in yeast, and suffering the whole to ferment.—2. A drink composed of syrup, with sarsaparilla or other flavouring matter, and water, sometimes impregnated with carbonic acid gas. [United States.]

Mead (mēd), n. Same as Meadow: chiefly used in poetry. 'The flowery meads of May.' Wither.

Meadow (mē'dō), n. [A. Sax. mædu, mædeve, a meadow, shorter form mæd, a mead; perhaps allied to math (after-math) and mow.] A low, level tract of land under grass, and generally mown annually or oftener for hay; a piece of grassland in general. Meadows are often on the banks of a river or lake, but so far above the surface as to be dry enough to produce grass and herbage of a superior quality. In America, the word is applied particularly to the low ground on the banks of rivers, consisting of a rich mould or an alluvial soil, whether grassland, pasture, tillage, or woodland.

Meadow (mē'dō), a. Belonging to or growing in a meadow; as, meadow flowers; meadow grass.

Meadow-beauty (mē'dō-bū-ti), n. An American name for plants of the genus Rhexia, having showy purple flowers; deer-grass.

Meadow-clover (mē'dō-klō-vēr), n. A popular name for a plant of the genus Trifolium, T. pratense.

Meadow-crane's-bill (mē'dō-krānz-bil), n. A plant, Geranium pratense.

Meadow-crowfoot (mē'dō-krō-fūt), n. A name given to the various species of Ranunculus, usually called Buttercup or Butter-flower.

Meadower (mē'dō-ēr), n. One who waters meadow lands to increase or preserve their verdure.

Meadow-foxtail (mē'dō-foks-tāl), n. A grass, the Alopecurus pratensis, of great agricultural value when cultivated on meadow land.

Meadow-grass (mē'dō-gras), n. The common name of several British species of plants of the genus Poa, nat. order Gramineæ. The P. pratensis, or smooth meadow-grass, is one of the most common of our agricultural grasses, and found in every pasture and meadow in the kingdom.

Meadow-lark (mē'dō-lārk), n. A song-bird of the United States belonging to the oriole family; Sturnella magna.

Meadow-ore (mē'dō-ōr), n. In mineral. conchoidal bog-iron ore.

Meadow Pepper-saxifrage, n. A plant of the genus Silene, the S. pratensis. Called also Pepper-saxifrage (see see).

Meadow-pink (mē'dō-pingk), n. A plant, the Dianthus Armeria.

Meadow-queen (mē'dō-kwēn), n. Same as Meadow-sweet.

Meadow-rue (mē'dō-rō), n. The common name of Thalictrum flavum, nat. order Ranunculaceæ. The root is said to be aperient and stomachic, and in its medicinal properties to resemble rhubarb.

Meadow-saffron (mē'dō-saf-fron), n. A plant, Colchicum autumnale. See COLCHICUM.

Meadow-sage (mē'dō-sāj), n. A plant, Salvia pratensis. See SAGE.

Meadow-saxifrage (mē'dō-sak-si-frāj), n. A plant, Pimpinella Saxifraga.

Meadow-sweet, Meadow-wort (mē'dō-swēt, mē'dō-wért), n. The common name of Spiræa Ulmaria, nat. order Rosaceæ. A decoction of it with copperas is used in the Hebrides for dyeing black. The root has been used as a tonic.

Meadowy (mē'dō-i), a. Pertaining to, resembling, or consisting of meadow.

Meagre, Meager (mē'gēr), a. [A. Sax. mæger, Icel. magr, D. Dan. Sw. and G. mager, Fr. maigre, Pr. magre, It. magro, all apparently from L. macer, lean.] 1. Destitute of flesh or having little flesh; thin; lean.

Meagre were his locks.

Sharp misery had worn him to the bones. Shak.

2. Wanting richness, fertility, strength, or the like; deficient in quantity or poor in quality; mean; poor; insignificant; small; scanty; as, a meagre style or composition; meagre annals. 'Men . . . of secular habits and meagre religious belief.' Is. Taylor.—3. In mineral. dry and harsh to the touch, as chalk.

Meagre†, Meager† (mē'gēr), v.t. To make lean.

His ceaseless sorrow for the unhappy maid Meagred his look, and on his spirit prey'd. Dryden.

Meagrely, Meagerly (mē'gēr-lī), adv. Poorly; thinly; sparsely; feebly. 'O physick's power . . . thou helpest meagrely.' Sir P. Sidney.

Meagreness, Meagerness (mē'gēr-nes), n. The condition or quality of being meagre: (a) leanness; want of flesh. 'They were famished into such a meagreness.' Hammond. (b) Poverty; barrenness; want of fertility or richness. (c) Scantiness; barrenness. 'The meagreness of his service in the wars.' Bacon.

Meagrim (mē'grim), n. Same as Megrin (which see).

Meak (mēk), n. [A. Sax. mece, a sword.] A hook with a long handle used in agriculture for pulling up plants.

Meaking-iron (mēk'ing-i-ēr-n), n. Naut. a tool used by caulkers to run old oakum out of the seams of ships before inserting new.

Meal (mēl), n. [A. Sax. mæl, time, portion, repast; D. and Dan. maal, G. mahl, Icel. mál, a part, repast, measure, time; Goth. mēl, time, occasion. The original meaning may have been a 'portion measured,' from root seen in measure, mete. It is the termination seen in piecemeal, limbmeal, parcelmeal—A. Sax. mæum, the dative plural used adverbially.] A portion of food taken at one of the regular times for eating; occasion of taking food; a repast. 'Great meals of beef.' Shak.

Unquiet meals make ill digestions. Shak.
What strange fish
Hath made his meal on thee? Shak.

Meal (mēl), n. [A. Sax. melu, melo, meolo, G. mehl, Icel. Sw. mjöl, D. Dan. meel, meal; lit. what is ground, from the verbal stem seen in Icel. mala, Goth. mellan, G. mahlen, L. molo, to grind. See MELLOW.] The edible part of wheat, oats, rye, barley, pease, and pulse of different kinds, ground into a species of flour.

Meal (mēl), v.t. 1. To grind into meal; to pulverize; as, mealed powder.—2. To sprinkle with meal, or to mix meal with. [Rare.] Meal† (mēl), v.t. [Perhaps from A. Sax. mæl, a mark, a spot.] To defile; to taint.

Were he meal'd with that
Which he corrects, then were he tyrannous. Shak.

Meal-ark (mēl'ārk), n. A large chest for holding meal. [Scotch.]

A whiggish mob . . . plundered his dwelling-place of four silver spoons, intronitting also with his mart and his meal-ark. Sir W. Scott.

Meal-beetle (mēl'bē-ti), n. A coleopterous insect belonging to the genus Tenebrio, whose larva is the meal-worm. See MEAL-WORM.

Mealies (mē'lēz), n. pl. A name given in South Africa to maize or Indian corn.

Mealiness (mēl'ē-nes), n. 1. The quality of being meal-y; softness or smoothness, with friableness and dryness to the touch or taste.—2. The quality of being meal-mouthed.

Meal-man, Meal-monger (mēl'man, mēl'mung-ēr), n. One who deals in meal.

Meal-moth (mēl'moth), n. A lepidopterous insect, the Pyralis farinalis, the larva of which feed upon meal.

Meal's-meat (mēl'mēt), n. Meat sufficient for a meal; the portion of food sufficient for a person at one time.

You ne'er yet had
A meal's-meat from my table, as I remember. Beau. & Fl.

Meal-time (mēl'tim), n. The usual time of eating meals.

Meal-tub (mēl'tub), n. A large tub or barrel for holding meal or flour.

Meal-worm (mēl'wērm), n. The larva of a coleopterous insect of the genus Tenebrio (T. molitor), which infests granaries, corn-mills, bake-houses, &c., and is very injurious to flour, meal, and the like.

Mealy (mē'lī), a. 1. Having the qualities of meal, or resembling meal in any of its qualities; as, a mealy powder; a mealy potato; a mealy apple.—2. Overspread with something that resembles meal; as, the mealy wings of an insect.—3. Mealy-mouthed. [Vulgar or slang.]

I didn't mince the matter with him. I'm never mealy with 'em. Dickens.

—Mealy bug, a species of Coccus (C. adonidum), covered with a white powdery substance. It is often found on the trunks of vines and other hothouse plants.

Mealy-mouthed (mēl'mouthd), a. Unwilling to tell the truth in plain language; inclined to speak of anything in softer terms than the truth will warrant.

Not a mealy-mouthed man! A candid ferocity, if the case call for it, is in him (Mahomet); W. does not mince matters. Carlyle.

Mealy-mouthedness (mēl'mouthd-nes), n. The quality of being mealy-mouthed.

Mean (mēn), a. [A. Sax. mæne, mean, false, bad, gemæne, common; Icel. meinn, mean, base; D. and Dan. gemeen, mean, base, common, Goth. gamains, G. gemein, common.] 1. Wanting dignity; low in rank or birth; common; low; vulgar; humble; as, a man of mean parentage, mean birth or origin.

Called from his mean abode his sceptre to sustain. Dryden.

2. Wanting dignity of mind; low-minded; base; destitute of honour; spiritless.

Can you imagine I so mean could prove,
To save my life by changing of my love? Dryden.

3. Of little value or account; low in worth or estimation; worthy of little or no regard; contemptible; despicable.

We fast, not to please men, nor to promote any mean worldly interest. Bp. Smalridge.

The Roman legions and great Caesar found
Our fathers no mean foes. J. Philips.

SYN. Ignoble, humble, poor, abject, beggarly, wretched, base, degraded, degenerate, vulgar, vile, servile, menial, spiritless, grovelling, slavish, dishonourable, disgraceful, shameful, despicable, contemptible, paltry, sordid, penurious, niggardly.

Mean (mēn), a. [O. Fr. meien, moien, Fr. moyen, Pr. meian, from L. medianus, middle, from medius, middle.] 1. Occupying a middle position; without excess; middle; moderate; intermediate.

One of the properest and best-graded men that ever I saw, being of middle age and a mean stature. Sir P. Sidney.

According to the fittest style of lofty, mean, or lowly. Milton.

2. In math. having an intermediate value between two extremes, or between the several successive values of a variable quantity during one cycle of variation; as, mean distance; mean motion; mean solar day. Mean proportional is the second of any three quantities in continued proportion. Extreme and mean proportion is when a line or any quantity is so divided that the less part is to the greater as the greater is to the whole.—Mean sun, in astron. an imaginary sun, supposed to describe the equator with an equal motion in the same period in which the real sun appears to describe the ecliptic with an unequal motion. The time in which an imaginary sun so moving in the equator would perform one of its apparent diurnal revolutions is called a mean solar day, and true or mean time is that which would be indicated by an imaginary sun moving as above supposed, and mean noon the time in which such a sun would be on the meridian. True or mean time is also indicated by a time-keeper regulated to go twenty-four hours in a mean solar day, and mean noon the instant when such a time-keeper indicates twelve o'clock. See DAY.—Mean moon, an imaginary moon, supposed to move with an equable motion in the equator or ecliptic as required, and in the same period as that in which the real moon performs a revolution in her orbit with an unequable motion.—Mean noon. See above under Mean Sun.—Mean distance of a planet from the sun, an arithmetical mean between its greatest and least distances.—Mean solar day, mean time. See above also under DAY.—Mean clef, in music, the C clef; the clef on which music for alto and tenor parts (intermediate between the outer parts treble and bass) was written. It is not now nearly so much used as formerly.

Mean (mēn), n. 1. That which is intermediate between two extremes; the middle point or place; the middle rate or degree; absence of extremes or excess; mediocrity; medium; moderation.

There is a mean in all things. Dryden.

But no authority of gods or men
Allow of any mean in poetry. Roscommon.

2. In math. a quantity having an intermediate value between several others from which it is derived, and of which it expresses the resultant value; usually, the simple average formed by adding the quantities together and dividing by their number, which is called an arithmetical mean. A geometrical mean is the square root of the product of the quantities. When a geometrical proportion consists of four terms the two middle terms are called the means or mean terms, and their product is equal to the product of the extremes. The harmonic mean between two quantities is a quantity which is double a fourth proportional to the sum of the two quantities and the quantities themselves:

Fâte, fâr, fat, fâll; mē, met, hér; pîne, pin; nôte, not, môte; tûbe, tub, bull; oil, pound; ù, Sc. abume; ý, Sc. fey.

thus, if a and b be the two quantities,
 $a+b : a :: b : \frac{ab}{a+b}$, the fourth proportional;
 and $\frac{2ab}{a+b}$ is therefore the harmonical mean.
 3.† Intervening time; interval of time; interim; meantime.

And in the mean vouchsafe her honourable tomb.
Spenser.
 4.† In music, an intermediate voice or part;
 the tenor or alto. 'A mean or tenor is the sweetest.' Bacon.

The base and treble married to the mean. Drayton.
 5. That which is used to effect an object;
 the medium through which something is done; measure or measures adopted; agency;
 instrumentality.

As long as that which Christians did was good,
 . . . their virtuous conversation was a mean to work
 the heathens' conversion unto Christ. Hooker.
 In this sense means, in the plural, is generally used, and often with a singular attribute or predicate.

By this means he had them the more at vantage.
Bacon.
 A good character, when established, should not be rested in as an end, but only employed as a means of doing still farther good. Atterbury.

6. pl. Income, revenue, resources, substance, or estate; disposable force or substance.
 Your means are very slender, and your waste is great. Shak.

—By all means, certainly; on every consideration; without fail; as, go, by all means.—
 By no means, not at all; certainly not; not in any degree.

The wine on this side of the lake is by no means so good as that on the other. Addison.

—By no manner of means, by no means; not the least.—By any means, possibly; at all.

If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead. Phil. iii. 11.

Mean (mēn), v.t. pret. & pp. meant; ppr.
meaning. [A. Sax. mænan, to mean, to remind, to tell; D. meenen, G. meinen, Goth. minnan, to think, to intend, to mean. Allied to L. mens, the mind, memini, to remember;
 Gr. μνῆσθαι, to remember; Lith. manyti,
 Bohem. mněti, to think; W. mynu, mind;
 Ir. mian, will, desire, all from a root man, seen unchanged in Skr. man, to think, to know. Man, mind, mention, &c., are therefore allied.] 1. To have in the mind, view, or contemplation; to intend; to signify.

What mean ye by this service? Ex. xii. 26.

2. To purpose; to design, with reference to a future act.

Ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good. Gen. i. 20.

3. To signify or be intended to signify; to indicate; to import; to denote.

What mean these seven ewe lambs? Gen. xxi. 29.

What meaneth the noise of this great shout in the camp of the Hebrews? x Sam. iv. 6.

SYN. To intend, purpose, design, contemplate, signify, indicate, denote, imply, import, express.

Mean (mēn), v.i. 1. To have thought or ideas, or to have meaning.

And he who now to sense none nonsense leaning,
Means not, but blunders round about a meaning. Pope.

2. To be minded or disposed; to have such and such intentions: joined with an adverb;
 as, he means well.

Meander (mē-an'dēr), n. [L. Mæander, Gr.
Μαίανδρος, a river in Phrygia proverbial for its windings.] 1. A winding course; a winding or turning in a passage; a maze; a labyrinth; as, the meanders of the veins and arteries. 'While lingering rivers in meanders glide.' Sir R. Blackmore.

Yet ten long years did Hocus steer his cause through all the meanders of the law, and all the courts. Arcthot.

2. A name given to some of the more complicated varieties of the fret ornament,

Meander.

having a labyrinthine character, and being frequently introduced as a border decoration on walls, Greek dresses, articles of pottery, &c.

Meander (mē-an'dēr), v.t. To wind, turn, or flow round. 'The bloomy beds . . . with silver-quivering rills meander d'oe.' Pope.

Meander (mē-an'dēr), v.i. To wind or turn in a course or passage; to have an intricate course.

Wild, deep, unsullied Thames meander's glides,
 And bears thy wealth on mild majestic tides.

Meandered (mē-an'dērd), pp. or a. Formed into or provided with meanders. 'Meandered gyres.' Drayton.

Meandrian (mē-an'dri-an), a. Winding;
 having many turns. 'Meandrian turnings and windings.' Dean King.

Meandrina (mē-an'dri-na), n. [From me- ander (which see).] A genus of madrepores, or corals, first established by La-marck for those in which the cups become continuous. The recent species belong to the Indian or South
 Atlantic seas.
 The fossil species are few,
 and mostly belong to the oolitic formation.

Brain-coral
 (Meandrina cerebri-formis).

Meandrous, Meandry (mē-an'drus, mē-an'- dri), a. Winding; flexuous. 'Meandrous falsehood.' Loveland. 'Meandry turnings.'
Bacon.

Meane† (mēn), n. Same as Mien. Spenser.

Meaneliche†, a. Moderate. Chaucer.

Meaning (mēn'ing), p. and a. Significant;
 as, a meaning look.

Meaning (mēn'ing), n. 1. That which exists in the mind, view, or contemplation as an aim or purpose; that which is meant or intended to be done; intent; purpose; aim; object.

I am no honest man if there be any good mean- ing towards you. Shak.

2. That which is to be understood, whether by act or language; the sense of words or expressions; that which a writer or speaker intends to express or communicate; signification; significance; import; force.

There is a sense in which it may be said that Nature speaks her own meaning with an indistinct and faltering voice, and needs some inspired interpreter to make music of her stammering accents.

Meaningless (mēn'ing-less), a. Having no meaning. 'Meaningless conversation.' T. Hook.

Meaningly (mēn'ing-ly), adv. In a meaning manner; significantly; intently; as, to look at a person meaningly.

Meanly (mēn'li), adv. In a mean manner or degree: (a) moderately; not in a great degree.

In the reign of Domitian, poetry was but meanly cultivated. Dryden.

(b) Without dignity or rank; in a low condition; as, meanly born. (c) Poorly; as, meanly dressed.

All meanly wrapt in the rude manger lies. Milton.

(d) Without greatness or elevation of mind;
 without honour; with a low mind or narrow views.

Would you meanly thus rely
 On power, you know, I must obey. Prior.

(e) Sordidly; in a niggardly manner. (f)
 Without respect; disrespectfully; as, to speak meanly of a person.

Our kindred and our very names seem to have something desirable in them: we cannot bear to have others think meanly of them. Watts.

Meanness (mēn'nes), n. The state or quality of being mean: (a) want of dignity or rank;
 low state; as, meanness of birth or condition.

Poverty and meanness of condition expose the wisest to scorn. South.

(b) Want of excellence of any kind; poor-ness; rudeness.

This figure is of a later date, by the meanness of the workmanship. Addison.

(c) Lowness of mind; want of dignity and elevation; want of high spirit; want of honour.

The name of servants has been reckoned to imply a certain meanness of mind, as well as lowness of condition. South.

(d) Sordidness; niggardliness.

Means (mēnz), n. pl. See MEAN, n., 5 and 6.

Mean-spirited (mēn'spi-rit-ed), a. Having a mean spirit.

Henry was so unfortunate, or so mean-spirited, as to yield. Brougham.

Meant (ment), pret. & pp. of mean.

Meantime (mēn'tim), adv. During the interval; in the interval between one specified period and another.

Meantime in shades of night Æneas lies. Dryden.

Meantime (mēn'tim), n. The interval between one specified period and another:
 only in the phrase in the meantime, formerly also the meantime.

The meantime, lady,
 I'll raise the preparation of a war. Shak.

Meanwhile (mēn'whil), adv. Same as Meantime, adv.

Meanwhile (mēn'whil), n. Same as Mean- time, n.: only in the phrase in the mean- while.

Mear (mēr), n. A pool. See MEER.

Mear† (mēr), n. A limit; a boundary. See MEER.

As it were, a common mear between lands.
Abp. Ussher.

Mear† (mēr), v.t. To bound; to divide.

When that brave honour of the Latin name
 Which meared her rule with Africa. Spenser.

Mear, Meer (mēr), n. A mare. [Scotch.]

Mearman, Meresman (mērz'man), n. One who points out boundaries. [Obsolete or local.]

Mease (mēs or mēz), n. 1. [From measure.]

The quantity of 500; as, a mease of herrings.

2. A message.

Measelry† (mēz'l-ri), n. [See MEASLES.]
 Leprosy.

Measle† (mēz'l), n. [See MEASLES.] A leper.

Measle† (mēz'l), v.t. To infect with measles.

Measled (mēz'ld), a. Infected or spotted with measles. 'Measled pork.' Hudibras.

Measledness (mēz'ld-nes), n. State of being measly.

Measles (mēz'lz), n. [Lit. the spots or spotted sickness; in D. mazelen, in G. ma- sern, pl. of maser (also mase, masel), O.G.
māsa, masar, a spot. 'This has only been by later use restrained to one kind of spotted sickness; but 'measle' (it is spelt in innumerable ways) was once leprosy, or more often the leper himself, and the disease 'meselry.' Abp. Trench.] 1.† Leprosy.

So shall my lungs
 Coin words till their decay against those measles,
 Which we disdain should tetter us. Shak.

2. A contagious disease of the human body, usually characterized by a crimson rash upon the skin in stigmatized dots, grouped in irregular circles or crescents, appearing about the third day, and terminating about the seventh. The disease is preceded by symptoms like catarrh, and accompanied by a constitutional febrile affection. Otherwise called Rubeola.—3. A disease of swine, characterized by reddish, watery pustules on the skin, cough, feverishness, and discharge at the nostrils, usually cured by cooling medicines, such as Epsom salts.—
 4. A disease of trees.

Measly (mēz'li), a. Infected with measles or eruptions like measles. 'All as she scrubb'd her measly rump.' Swift.

Measurable (mez'h'ūr-a-bl), a. [See ME- ASURE.] 1. That may be measured; susceptible of mensuration or computation.

God's eternal duration is permanent and invisible, not measurable by time and motion. Bentley.

2. Moderate; in small quantity or extent.
 'A measurable mildness or mean in all things.' North.

Measurableness (mez'h'ūr-a-bl-nes), n.
 The quality of being measurable or admitting of mensuration.

Measurably (mez'h'ūr-a-bli), adv. In a measurable manner: (a) in such a manner as can be measured. (b) Moderately; in a limited degree.

Yet do it measurably, as it becometh Christians.
Latimer.

Measure (mez'h'ūr), n. [Fr. mesure; L. me- surā, from metior, mensus, to measure; allied to Gr. metron, a measure; from an Indo-European root ma, to measure, from which come also moon, month, L. mensis, and Skr. māsa, a month.] 1. The extent of a thing in any one or more of the three dimensions, length, breadth, and thickness, in circumference, capacity, or in any other respect.

The measure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea. Job xl. 9.

2. The whole number of measurements required by a tradesman in order to make an article of dress; as, to take one's measure for a coat or a pair of boots.—3. A standard of measurement; a fixed unit of capacity or extent; a definite amount, fixed by law or custom, in terms of which the size or capacity of anything is ascertained and expressed; as, a yard is a measure of length, a gallon a measure of capacity, a square foot a measure of area.

For law we have a measure, know what to trust to; equity is according to the conscience of him that is Chancellor; and as that is larger or narrower, so is equity. Selden.

4. The instrument by which extent or capacity is ascertained; a measuring rod or line; as, he carries his measure in his pocket; a foot-rule is his measure.—5. A limited or definite quantity; as, a measure of wine or beer. 'Be large in mirth; anon we'll drink a measure.' Shak.—6. Determined extent or length; limit.

Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days. Ps. xxxix. 4.

Aught not surpassing human measure, say. Milton.
7. That which is measured, allotted, or dealt out to one; as, to give one good measure or hard measure.—8. Full or sufficient quantity. [Rare.]

Till never pause again, never stand still,
Till either death hath closed these eyes of mine,
Or fortune given me measure of revenge. Shak.

9. Moderation; just degree; common in such phrases as, beyond measure, within measure, &c.

There is measure in everything. Shak.

10. Degree; indefinite quantity.

I have laid down, in some measure, the description of the old world. Abp. Abbot.

There is a great measure of discretion to be used in the performance of confession. Fer. Taylor.

11. Means to an end; action for the accomplishment of a purpose; a scheme brought before a legislative body; as, a wise measure; rash measures, &c. [This use, though found both in Milton and Clarendon, and now very common, does not occur once in Shakspeare. It seems to have originated in the phrase to take measures, in the sense of to estimate the magnitude of the object to be achieved, with the view of determining what means will be required to accomplish it.]—12. In music, (a) that division by which the motion of music, or the time of dwelling on each note, is regulated. (b) Same as Time in music.—13. In poetry, the arrangement of the syllables in each line with respect to quantity or accent; metre; rhythm; as, hexameter measure; iambic decasyllabic measure.—14. Any regulated or graceful motion, especially motion adjusted to musical time; a grave solemn dance, with slow and measured steps, like the minuet.

Where is the horse that doth untried again
His tedious measures with the untried fire
That he did pace them first? Shak.

Hath not my gait in the measure of the court?
Shak.

Now tread we a measure! said young Lochinvar.
Sir W. Scott.

15. pl. In geol. beds; strata: used solely or almost solely in the phrase, coal-measures.—Measure of a number or quantity, in math. a number or quantity is said to be a measure of another when the former is contained in the latter a certain number of times exactly.—Greatest common measure of two or more numbers or quantities, the greatest number or quantity which divides them all without a remainder.—Measure of a ratio, its logarithm in any system of logarithms; or the exponent of the power to which the ratio is equal, the exponent of some given ratio being assumed as unity. See RATIO.—Standards of measure. (See definition 3.) In this country the unit of lineal measure is the yard, all other denominations being either multiples or aliquot parts of the yard. The length of the imperial standard yard, according to an act of parliament passed in 1824, was the straight line or distance between the centres of the two points in the gold studs in the brass rod in the custody of the clerk of the House of Commons, entitled, standard yard, 1760. By the same act, the brass rod, when used, must be at the temperature of 62° of Fahrenheit's thermometer. It was enacted at the same time that if this standard should be lost or destroyed, the length of the yard should be determined by reference to the length of a pendulum vibrating seconds of mean time in a vacuum in the latitude of London, at sea-level. When the standard yard was actually destroyed, however, by the fire which consumed the two Houses of Parliament in 1834, the commissioners appointed to restore the standard decided that it was better to do so by means of authentic copies of the old standard. This was accordingly done, and five official copies were made, one of which, the national standard, is preserved at the exchequer in a stone coffin in a window-seat of a groined room; one immured in a wall of the lower waiting-room of the House of Commons; one preserved in a bullion-room at the mint; one at the royal observatory, Greenwich, and one intrusted to the Royal Society. The national standard is the distance between two fine transverse lines on a square rod of gun-metal 38 inches long. In France the mètre is the standard or unit of linear measure; the are, or 100 square mètres, the unit of surface measure; and the stère, or cube of a mètre, the unit of solid measure. The system of measure, called the decimal or metric system, based upon these standards, is now largely adopted. See under METRIC.—Standard measure of capacity. For all sorts of liquids, corn, and dry goods, the standard measure is declared by the act of 1824 to be the imperial gallon, which should contain 10 lbs. avoirdupois weight of distilled water weighed in air at the temperature of 62° Fahr., the barometer being at 30 inches. The official measurement of this quantity of water measured under the specified conditions gave as the result 277.274 cubic inches, which, though since ascertained to be slightly in excess of the true measurement (277.123 cubic inches), is still the legal capacity of the gallon.—Lineal or long measure, measure of length; the measure of lines or distances.—Liquid measure, the measure of liquors.—Square measure, the measure of surfaces, expressed in square yards or any other square unit of length.—To take the measure of, to observe narrowly so as to form a judgment concerning.

Measure (mez'h'ür), v.t. pret. & pp. measured; ppr. measuring. 1. To compute or ascertain the extent, quantity, dimensions, or capacity of, by a certain rule or standard; as, to measure land; to measure distance; to measure the altitude of a mountain; to measure the capacity of a ship or of a cask; to measure the degree of heat or moisture. 2. To serve as the measure of; to be adequate to express the size of.

An ell and three quarters will not measure her from hip to hip. Shak.

3. To estimate by an inexact standard; to guess the magnitude of by the unassisted senses; to judge of the greatness of; to appreciate; to value.

If I be measured rightly,
Your majesty hath no just cause to hate me. Shak.

Great are thy works, Jehovah! infinite
Thy power! what thought can measure thee. Milton.

4. To pass through or over.

We must measure twenty miles to-day. Shak.
The vessel ploughs the sea,
And measures back with speed her former way. Dryden.

5. To adjust; to proportion.

To secure a contented spirit, measure your desires by your fortunes, not your fortunes by your desires. Fer. Taylor.

6. To allot or distribute by measure: in this sense often with out.

With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. Mat. vii. 2.

—To measure one's (own) length, to lie, fall, or be thrown down.

If you will measure your lubber's length again, tarry; but away! Shak.

—To measure strength, to ascertain by trial which of two parties is the stronger; specifically, to engage in a contest.

The two parties were still regarding each other with cautious hostility, and had not yet measured their strength, when news arrived which inflamed the passions and confirmed the opinions of both. Macaulay.

—To measure swords, to fight with swords.

Measure (mez'h'ür), v.i. 1. To take a measurement or measurements.—2. To result or turn out on being measured; as, you will find it will measure well.—3. To be in extent; as, cloth measures three-fourths of a yard; a tree measures three feet in diameter. [The terms expressing the measurement are in the objective absolute, or more correctly speaking in the accusative of extent.]

Measured (mez'h'ürd), p. and a. 1. Computed or ascertained by a rule; adjusted; proportioned; passed over.—2. Deliberate and uniform; slow and steady; stately; formal; as, he walked with measured steps. 3. Limited or restricted; within bounds; moderate; as, in no measured terms.

Measureless (mez'h'ür-les), a. Without measure; unlimited; immeasurable. 'Measureless content.' Shak.

And most of all would I fee from the cruel madness of love,
The honey of poison-flowers, and all the measureless ill. Tennyson.

Measurement (mez'h'ür-ment), n. 1. The act of measuring; mensuration.—2. The amount ascertained by measuring; the bulk; size; area or content.—Measurement goods, light goods which are charged for carriage by the bulk of the packages, as distinguished from heavy goods which are charged by weight.

Measurer (mez'h'ür-ér), n. One who or that which measures; specifically, (a) one whose occupation or duty is to measure commodities in market; (b) one who measures work on a building as a basis for contractors' prices. (c) An officer in the city of London, who measured woollen cloths, coals, &c. Called also a Meter. See ALNAGER.

Measuring (mez'h'ür-ing), p. and a. 1. Computing or ascertaining length, dimensions, capacity, or amount.—2. Used in measuring; as, a measuring rod or line.—A measuring cast, a cast or throw in a game that requires to be measured, or that cannot be distinguished from another but by measuring.

When lusty shepherds throw
The bar by turns, and none the rest outgo
So far, but that the best are measuring casts,
Their emulation and their pastime lasts. Walter.

Meat (mēt), n. [A. Sax. mete, mæte, O. Fris. mete, mēt, Icel. matr, mata, Dan. mad, Sw. mat, Goth. mat, food; farther connections doubtful.] 1. Food in general; anything eaten or fit for eating as nourishment, either by man or beast.

And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb . . . to eat it shall be for meat. Gen. i. 29.

Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you. Gen. ix. 3.

Shall I not take care of all that I think,
Yea, ev'n of wretched meat and drink? Tennyson.

2. The flesh of animals used as food; as, the meat of carnivorous animals is tough, coarse, and ill-favoured; the meat of herbivorous animals is generally palatable.—3. The edible portion of something; as, the meat of an egg.—To sit at meat, to sit or recline at the table.

Meat (mēt), v.t. To supply with meat or food; to feed. [Old English and Scotch.]

Meatal (mē-ä'tal), a. Of or belonging to a meatus; having the character of a meatus.

In the hare the meatal part of the tympanic is long and ascends obliquely backward from the frame of the drum-membrane. Owen.

Meat-biscuit (mēt/bis-ke't), n. A concentrated preparation of the most nutritious parts of meat, pounded and mixed with meal, and baked in the form of a biscuit, used in long voyages, travels, &c.

Meated (mēt'ed), a. Fed; fattened.

Strong oxen and horses, well shod and well clad,
Well meated and used. Tusser.

Meat-fly (mēt'flī), n. A fly which deposits its eggs on meat; particularly the Musca vomitoria, a blue-bodied species, which abounds in the summer.

Meath (mēth), n. [See MEAD.] Liquor or drink obtained from fruit.

For drink the grape
She crushes, inoffensive must, and meaths
From many a berry. Milton.

Meatiness (mēt/i-nes), n. The state or quality of being meaty; fleshiness.

Meatless (mēt'les), a. Destitute of meat.

Meat-offering (mēt'of-er-ing), n. An offering or sacrifice consisting of meat or food, or more strictly of nothing but flour and oil. The law or ceremonial of the Jewish meat-offering is described in Lev. ii. and vi.

Meat-pie (mēt'pi), n. A pie made of meat or flesh.

Meat-salesman (mēt'sälz-man), n. One who sells meat; specifically, an agent in town who receives carcasses from cattle-raisers for sale, and disposes of them to retail butchers.

Meat-screen (mēt'skrēn), n. A metal screen placed behind meat while roasting, to reflect the heat of the fire.

Meatus (mē-ä'tus), n. [L. from meo, to go.] A passage: a term applied in anatomy to various ducts and passages of the body; as, the meatus auditorius, the passage of the ear; meatus cysticus, the gall-duct.

Meaty (mēt'i), a. Abounding in meat; fleshy, but not fat; resembling meat; as, a meaty flavour.

Meaw, Meawl (mū, mül). See MEW, MEWL.

Meazel† (mē'z'l), n. Same as Measle.

Meazle (mē'z'l), v.t. To fall in very fine drops: said of rain. See MISTLE, MIZZLE.

The air feels more moist when the water is in small than in great drops; in meazling and soaking rain, than in great showers. Arbutnot.

Meubles†, n. pl. [Fr. meubles.] Movable goods. Chaucer.

Mechanic (mē-kan'ik), n. 1. One skilled or employed in shaping and uniting materials, as wood, metal, &c., into any kind of structure, machine, or other object; an artisan; an artificer; one who follows a mechanical occupation for his living: a term somewhat loosely applied, but always excluding agricultural labourers, or labourers who work with pick, shovel, spade, or similar tools, and sometimes restricted to those employed in making and repairing machinery.—Mechanics' institute, an institution for the instruction and recreation of persons of the lower and artisan classes, by means of lectures, a library, museum, courses of lessons, &c.—SYN. Artificer, artisan, operative.

Mechanic (mē-kan'ik), a. Same as Mechanical, but not so commonly or widely applied. In the following quotations it is used in the sense noted under MECHANICAL, 4.

Mechanic slaves

With greasy aprons, rules, and hammers. Shak.

To make a god, a hero, or a king,
Descend to a mechanic dialect. Roscommon.

Mechanical (mē-kan'ik-al), a. [L. mechanicus, Gr. mēchanikos, from mēchanē, a machine.] 1. Pertaining to or in accordance with the principles or laws of mechanics; depending upon mechanism or machinery; as, a mechanical contrivance. 2. Resembling a machine; as (a) acting without thought or independence of judgment: said of persons; as, he was a mechanical follower of the precepts of his master. (b) Done as if by a machine, that is, without deliberate design, but by the mere force of habit, or characterized by slavish and unthinking obedience to rule or external guidance; as, he made a mechanical movement with his hand; the artists' work betrayed a mechanical style of drawing. 3. Pertaining to artisans or mechanics or their employments. Hence—4.† In disparagement, of mean occupation; base; rude; mean; vulgar; servile. 'Base and mechanical nigardise.' Holland.

Hang him, mechanical salt-butter rogue! Shak.

See also quotations under MECHANIC.—5. Acting by or resulting from weight or momentum; as, mechanical pressure. —6. Pertaining to those changes of bodies in which they form compounds without losing their identity in the compound substance: as opposed to chemical; as, a mechanical mixture; mechanical decomposition.—Mechanical philosophy, also called the corpuscular philosophy, is that which explains the phenomena of nature and the operations of corporeal things on the principles of mechanics, viz. the motion, gravity, figure, arrangement, disposition, greatness, or smallness of the parts which compose natural bodies.—Mechanical powers, the simple instruments or elements of which every machine, however complicated, must be constructed; they are the lever, the wheel and axle, the pulley, the inclined plane, the wedge, and the screw.—Mechanical solution of a problem, a solution by any art or contrivance not strictly geometrical, as by means of the ruler and compasses or other instruments.—Mechanical theory, in med., that system by which all diseases were attributed principally to lentor, or morbid viscosity of the blood.—Rocks of mechanical origin, in geol. rocks composed of sand, pebbles, fragments, and the like, mechanically united; as distinguished from those which have a regular crystalline texture.—Mechanical curve, a curve of such a nature that the relation between the abscissa and the ordinate cannot be expressed by an algebraic equation. Such curves are now generally called transcendental curves.—Mechanical, Chemical. These terms are thus distinguished: those changes which bodies undergo without altering their constitution, that is, losing their identity, such as changes of place, of figure, &c., are mechanical; those which alter the constitution of bodies, making them different substances, as when flour, yeast, and water unite to form bread, are chemical. In the one case, the changes relate to masses of matter, as the motions of the heavenly bodies, or the action of the wind on a ship under sail; in the other case, the changes occur between the particles of matter, as the action of heat in melting lead, or the union of sand and lime forming mortar. Most of what are usually called the mechanic arts are partly mechanical and partly chemical.

Mechanical (mē-kan'ik-al), n. A mechanic. 'Rude mechanicals.' Shak.

Mechanicalize (mē-kan'ik-al-iz), v.t. To render mechanical or mean; to debase.

Mechanically (mē-kan'ik-al-iz), adv. In a mechanical manner: (a) according to the laws of mechanism or good workmanship.

(b) By physical force or power. (c) In a manner resembling a machine; without thought or intelligence; without independence of judgment; by the mere force of habit; as, to play on an instrument mechanically.

Mechanicalness (mē-kan'ik-al-nes), n. The state of being mechanical or governed by, or as if by, mechanism.

Mechanician (mek-an-ish'an), n. One skilled in mechanics.

The observations of mechanicians show certain things respecting falling bodies on our globe. Brougham.

Mechanico-chemical (mē-kan'ik-kō-kem'ik-al), a. Pertaining to or dependent on both mechanics and chemistry; a term used specifically in regard to the sciences of galvanism, electricity, and magnetism, which exhibit phenomena which require for their explanation an application of the laws of mechanics and chemistry.

Mechanics (mē-kan'iks), n. 1.† The science of machinery. Newton.—2. A common name for the science which treats of motion and force. This science has often been divided by writers into—statics, embracing the principles or theorems which apply to bodies at rest under the action of natural forces; and dynamics, embracing the principles of equilibrium and action of bodies in a state of motion. Other writers subdivide the subject into the mechanics of solids and the mechanics of fluids; and a modern division is into kinematics, or the laws of motion geometrically considered, without reference to the causes of motion, and dynamics, or the laws of motion and force.—Animal mechanics, a branch of mechanics in which the principles of the science are applied to the explanation of the solid framework of the human body, and also of the different animal motions, the whole structure being regarded as a machine. The most important mechanical principle which comes into operation in the animal machine is that of the lever. The bones form the arms of the levers, the muscles, contractile at the command of the will or fancy, represent the power, the joints the fulcrums or points of support; and the weight of the body or of individual limbs, as it may happen, constitute the weight or resistance, increased, as in the case of the hands at times, by some substance carried or held by them.—Practical mechanics, the application of the principles of mechanics to practical purposes, as the construction of machines, buildings, &c.—Rational mechanics, that branch of mechanics which treats of the theory of motion; kinematics.

Mechanism (mek'an-izm), n. 1. The parts collectively, or the arrangement of the parts of a machine, engine, or instrument intended to apply power to a useful purpose; the arrangement and relation of the moving and other parts in a machine; mechanical construction; machinery; as, the mechanism is very complicated; a skillful piece of mechanism.

Art does not analyse, or abstract, or classify, or generalize; it does not lay bare the mechanism of thought, or evolve by a rigid dialectic the secret order and system of nature and history. Dr. Caird.

2. Action according to the laws of mechanics; mechanical action. [Rare.]

After the chyle has passed through the lungs, nature continues her usual mechanism to convert it into animal substances. Arbutnot.

Mechanist (mek'an-ist), n. 1. A maker of machines, or one skilled in machinery; a mechanic.

The mechanist will be afraid to assert before hardy contradiction the possibility of tearing down bulwarks with a silk-worm's thread. Fohnsen.

2. One of a school of philosophers who refer all the changes in the universe to the effect of merely mechanical forces.

Mechanize (mek'an-iz), v.t. pret. & pp.

mechanized; ppr. mechanizing. To subject to contrivance, art, or skill; to form by contrivance or design; to form mechanically. 'The human frame a mechanized automaton.' Shelley.

Mechanographic (mek'an-ō-graf'ik), a. 1. Treating of mechanics. [Rare.]—2. Pertaining to mechanography.

Mechanographist (mek-an-ō-gra-fist), n. An artist who, by mechanical means, multiplies copies of any work of art, writing, or the like.

Mechanography (mek-an-ō-gra-fi), n. [Gr. mēchanē, a machine, and graphō, to write or engrave.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or any work of art by the use of a machine.

Mechanurgy (mek'an-ēr-jī), n. [Gr. mēchanē, a machine, and ergon, work.] That branch of mechanics which treats of moving machines. [Rare.]

Mechitarist (mek-it'ar-ist), n. [After Mechitar Da Petro, a native of Sebaste, who founded a religious society at Constantinople for the purpose of disseminating a knowledge of the old Armenian language and literature.] One of a society or sect of Armenians acknowledging the authority of the pope, but retaining their own ritual with a few alterations. They have printed the best editions of Armenian classics.

Mechlin (mek'lin), n. A species of fine lace made at Mechlin or Malines in Belgium.

Mechlin (mek'lin), a. The term applied to a fine kind of lace manufactured at Mechlin, or Malines, in Belgium.

Mechoacan Root (mē-chō'a-kan), n. [From Mechoacan, in Mexico, whence it is obtained.] The large thick tuber of Ipomoea (Batatas) Jalapa, a native of Mexico and the Southern States of America. It yields a jalap of very feeble properties.

Mecometer (mē-kom-et-ēr), n. [Gr. mēkos, length, and metron, measure.] A kind of graduated compass used to measure the length of new-born infants.

Mecconate (mē'kon-āt), n. A salt of meconic acid.

Meconic (mē-kon'ik), a. [Gr. mēkōn, a poppy.] A term applied to the peculiar acid with which morphia is combined in opium. When pure, meconic acid (C₇H₅O₄) forms small white crystals. Its aqueous solution forms a deep red colour with the persalts of iron, which therefore are good tests for it. It is a tribasic acid.

Meconin, Meconine (mē'kon-in), n. [Gr. mēkōn, a poppy.] (C₁₀H₁₀O₄) A neutral substance existing in opium. It is a white fusible substance, composed of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen.

Meconium (mē-kō'ni-um), n. [Gr. mēkōnion, from mēkōn, a poppy.] 1.† The inspissated juice of the poppy.—2. The first faeces of infants.

Meconopsis (mē-kō'p-sis), n. [Gr. mēkōn, a poppy, and opsis, appearance.] A small genus of plants, nat. order Papaveraceæ. They are perennial, rarely annual herbs, with yellow juice, entire or lobed leaves, and handsome yellow, purple, or blue flowers on long stalks, which droop when in bud. One species (M. cambrica, or Welsh poppy) occurs in Great Britain, and is often grown on rockwork as an ornamental plant.

Medal (med'al), n. [Fr. médaille, from L. metallum, Gr. metallon, metal. See METAL.] A coin, or a piece of metal in the form of a coin, stamped with some figure or device to preserve the portrait of some distinguished person, or the memory of an illustrious action or event, or as a reward of merit.

The Roman medals were their current coin; when an action deserved to be recorded on a coin, it was stamped and issued out of the mint. Addison.

Medalet (med'al-et), n. A smaller kind of medal, not larger than the varieties of the ordinary current coinage of a country, but differing from that in never passing for money or having the same die. Medalets are sometimes suspended from the person, and in Catholic countries are impressed with figures of saints.

Medallic (mē-dal'ik), a. Pertaining to a medal or to medals.

Admiral Vernon will shine in our medallic history. H. Walpole.

Medallion (mē-dal'yun), n. [Fr. médallion, from médaille.] 1. A large antique medal struck in Rome and in the provinces by the emperors. They were usually of gold or silver, and exceeded in size the largest coins of these metals of which the name and value

ch, chain; ch, Sc. loch; g, go; j, job;

n, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

are known. They were probably struck to commemorate persons or events.

Medallions, in respect of the other coins, were the same as modern medals in respect of modern money. Addison.

2. Anything resembling such a piece of metal, as, in arch. any circular or oval, and sometimes square tablet, bearing on it objects represented in relief, as figures, heads, animals, flowers, &c.

Medallist, Medalist (med'al-ist), n. 1. An engraver, stamper, or moulder of medals. 'Sculptors, painters, and medalists.' Macaulay.—2. A person that is skilled or curious in medals.—3. One who has gained a medal as the reward of merit.

Medallurgy (med'al-er-ij), n. [Medal, and Gr. ergon, work.] The art of making and striking medals and coins.

Meddle (med'l), v.t. pret. & pp. meddled; ppr. meddling. [O.E. medlen, to mix or mingle, from O.Fr. medler, mesler, to mix, to mingle, se mesler de, to mix one's self up with; Mod.Fr. mêler, to mix, to meddle; from L.L. misculare, from L. miscere, to mix. See MEDLEY, MÊLÉE.] 1. To mingle; to mix.

Did never meddle with my thoughts. Shak.
[That is, enter into my thoughts.]—2. To deal; to treat; to take part; followed by with.

With the power of it upon the spirits of men we will only meddle. Bacon.

3. To interfere with matters with which one should have nothing to do; to take part in another person's affairs in an officious, impertinent, or offensive manner; to handle, touch, or use things with which one has no business: followed by with or in, or used absolutely.

Why shouldst thou meddle to thy hurt?
2 Ki. xiv. 10.

The civil lawyers . . . have meddled in a matter that belongs not to them. Locke.

What hast thou to do to meddle with the affairs of my family?
Arbutnot.

SYN. To interpose, interfere, intermeddle.
Meddle† (med'l), v.t. To mix; to mingle.
Meddled his talk with many a tear. Spenser.

They gave him to drink wine meddled with gall.
Mat. xvii. 34, Wickliffe's Trans.

Meddler (med'lér), n. One that meddles; one that interferes or busies himself with things in which he has no concern; an officious person; a busybody.

Do not drive away such as bring thee information as meddlers, but accept of them in good part. Bacon.

Meddlesome (med'l-sum), a. Given to meddling; apt to interpose in the affairs of others; officiously intrusive.

Christendom could not have been so long, if there had been so meddlesome a body in as the pope now is. Barrov.

Meddlesomeness (med'l-sum-nes), n. Officious interposition in the affairs of others. 'Such meddlesomeness is commonly blamable.' Barrov.

Meddling (med'ling), p. and a. Officious; busy or officiously interposing in other men's affairs; as, a meddling neighbour.

A meddling government, a government which tells them what to read, and say, eat, and drink, and wear. Macaulay.

Meddlingly (med'ling-li), adv. In a meddling manner; officiously; interferingly.

Mede (méd), n. A native or inhabitant of Media, an ancient kingdom of Asia.

The thing is true, according to the law of the Meder and Persians, which altereth not. Dan. vi. 12.

Media, n. pl. See MEDIUM.

Mediacy (méd-i-a-si), n. The state of being mediate, or being an intervening step or cause.

Were there in these syllogisms no occult conversion of an undeclared consequent, no mediacy from the antecedent, they could not in their ostensible conclusion reverse the quantities of Breadth and Depth. Sir W. Hamilton.

Mediæval, Mediæval (med-i-ē'val), a. Relating to the middle ages.

The darkest portion of the mediæval period was different in different countries. In a general way, however, it may be assigned to the tenth century. Hallam.

Mediæval, Mediæval (med-i-ē'val), n. One belonging to the middle ages.

This view of landscape differs from that of the mediævals. Ruskin.

Mediævalism, Mediævalism (med-i-ē'val-izm), n. The spirit or principles of the middle ages; adoption of the principles of the middle ages: said particularly of religion and art.

Mediævalist, Mediævalist (med-i-ē'val-ist), n. One versed in the history of the middle ages; one who sympathizes with the spirit and principles of the middle ages. Quart. Rev.

Mediævally, Mediævally (med-i-ē'val-li), adv. In a mediæval manner; in the manner of the middle ages.

Medial (méd-i-al), a. [L. medialis, from medius, middle.] Mean; pertaining to a mean or average.—Medial allegation, in arith. a method of finding the mean rate or value of a mixture consisting of two or more ingredients of different quantities and values, the quantity and value of each ingredient being given.

Medial (méd-i-al), n. In Greek gram. a name sometimes given to the three Greek letters b, g, d, as being intermediate in sound between the hard mutes p, k, t, and the aspirates ph, ch, th.

Median (méd-i-an), a. Of or pertaining to Media, an ancient kingdom of Asia.

Median (méd-i-an), n. Same as Mede.

Median (méd-i-an), a. [L. medianus, from medius, middle.] Situated in the middle; passing through or along the middle.—Median line, in anat. a vertical line, supposed to divide the body longitudinally into two equal parts.—Median zone, in geog. and biol. that interval or zone in the ocean between 50 and 100 fathoms in depth beyond which it was formerly believed that life did not exist. It is now known that life exists to all depths in the ocean.

Mediant (méd-i-ant), n. [It. mediante, from L. medio, to divide in the middle, from L. medius, middle.] In music, an appellation given to the third above the key-note, because it divides the interval between the tonic and dominant into two thirds. In the scale of C, F is the mediant.

Mediastinal (méd-i-as-ti-nal), a. Relating to the mediastinum.—Mediastinal arteries, very delicate arterial branches distributed in the cellular tissue of the mediastinum.

Mediastinitis (méd-i-as-ti-ni'tis), n. [E. mediastinum, and Gr. term. tis, denoting inflammation.] Inflammation of the mediastinum.

Mediastinum (méd-i-as-ti-num), n. [Formerly also mediastine; L.L. mediastinum, neut. of L. mediastinus, in the middle, from medius, middle.] The membranous septum of the chest, formed by the duplicature of the pleura under the sternum, and dividing the cavity into two parts.

Mediate (méd-i-ät), a. [L. medio, mediatum, to divide in the middle, from medius, middle.] 1. Being between two extremes; middle; interposed or intervening in space.

Anxious we hover in a mediate state
Betwixt infinity and nothing. Prior.

Soon the mediate clouds shall be dispelled:
The sun shall soon be face to face beheld. Prior.

2. Acting as a means or medium; leading up to what acts directly or immediately; not direct or immediate.

It is certain that the immediate cause of death is the resolution or extinguishment of the spirits; and that the destruction or corruption of the organs is but the mediate cause. Bacon.

3. Effected or gained by the intervention of a medium; as, the mediate perception of the agreement or disagreement between two ideas. Locke.

An act of mediate knowledge is complex. Sir W. Hamilton.

—Mediate auscultation or percussion, in pathol. a mode of investigating the internal parts of the body by means of percussion and auscultation, in which a solid substance called a pleximeter (stroke-measurer) is placed upon the spot, the resonance of which is to be explored, and the blow made upon that substance.

Mediate (méd-i-ät), v.i. pret. & pp. mediated; ppr. mediating. 1. To interpose between parties, as the equal friend of each; to negotiate between contending parties, with a view to reconciliation; to intercede; to arbitrate; as, to mediate between two enemies.—2. To be between two. [Rare.]

By being crowded they exclude all other bodies that before mediated between the parts of their body. Sir K. Digby.

Mediate (méd-i-ät), v.t. 1. To effect by mediation or interposition between parties.

The earl made many professions of his desire to interpose and mediate a good peace between the nations. Clarendon.

2. To connect, as two things distinctly separate, by the interposition of something between; to put in relation by some intervening means or process.

They (beliefs of the ordinary consciousness) have been acquired by no conscious intellectual process, whereby thought and reality have been mediated with each other, and therefore we can have no certainty as to their truth, or as to their relation to each other. Dr. Caird.

Mediately (méd-i-ät-li), adv. In a mediate manner; indirectly.

God worketh all things amongst us mediately by secondary means. Sir W. Raleigh.

The king grants a manor to A., and A. grants a portion to B. In this case, B. holds his land immediately of A., but mediately of the king. Blackstone.

Mediateness (méd-i-ät-nes), n. The state or quality of being mediate or intervening.

Mediation (méd-i-ä-shon), n. 1. The act of mediating; agency between parties at variance, with a view to reconcile them; entreaty for another; intercession.

Noble offices thou mayest effect
Of mediation, after I am dead,
Between his greatness and thy other brethren. Shak.

2. Action or relation of anything interposed; interposition; intervention; mediate agency.

The soul, during its residence in the body, does all things by the mediation of the passions. South.

Mediative (méd-i-ät-iv), a. Of or belonging to a mediator; mediatorial.

The consequence of our consultations was, that some Northern Power should be applied to in a friendly and mediative capacity. Disraeli.

Mediatization (méd-i-ät-iz-ä'shon), n. The act of mediatizing; the term applied to the annexation of the smaller German sovereignties to larger contiguous states, which took place on a large scale after the dissolution of the German Empire in 1806. The term was originally used, during the continuance of the empire, in reference to the conversion of certain states into portions of the territory with which they were directly connected, such states being said to be mediatized, that is, made mediate, instead of immediately dependent on the empire.

Mediatize (méd-i-ät-iz), v.t. pret. & pp. mediatized; ppr. mediatizing. To render mediate; specifically, to render mediate dependent; to annex, as a small state governed by a sovereign prince, to a larger one, yet allowing the ruler of the small state to retain his princely rank, rights, and privileges. See MEDIATIZATION.

Mediator (méd-i-ät-ér), n. One that mediates; one that interposes between parties at variance for the purpose of reconciling them.

Mediators were appointed to reconcile the dukes of Gloucester and Burgundy. Hallam.

Hence, by way of eminence, Christ is called THE MEDIATOR, the intercessor through whom sinners may be reconciled to God. 1 Tim. ii. 5.

Christ is a mediator by nature, as partaking of both natures divine and human; and mediator by office, as transacting matters between God and man. Waterland.

SYN. Intercessor, advocate, propitiator, interceder, arbitrator, umpire.

Mediatorial (méd-i-ä-tö-ri-al), a. Belonging to a mediator; pertaining to the office or character of a mediator; as, mediatorial office or character.

My measures were, in their intent, healing and mediatorial. Burke.

Mediatorially (méd-i-ä-tö-ri-al-li), adv. In the manner of a mediator.

Mediatorship (méd-i-ät-ér-ship), n. The office of a mediator.

Mediatory (méd-i-ä-to-ri), a. Pertaining to mediation; mediatorial.

His mediatory kingdom being fulfilled, it might be delivered up unto the Father. Bp. Hopkins.

Mediatress, Mediatrix (méd-i-ät-res, méd-i-ät-riks), n. A female mediator.

This stately coquet (Queen Elizabeth), the guardian of the Protestant faith, the terror of the sea, the mediatrix of the factions of Europe. T. Warren.

Medic, Medick (méd'ik), n. [Gr. médiķe, a name given to Median grass.] A plant of the genus Medicago (which see).

Medic† (méd'ik), a. Same as Medicinal. [Rare.] Medicable (méd-i-kä-bl), a. [See MEDICAL.] That may be cured or healed.

Medicago (med-i-kä'gō), n. [See MEDIC.] A genus of plants, nat. order Leguminosæ, sub-order Papilionaceæ, nearly allied to the clover. The species are herbaceous or shrubby plants with trifoliate leaves, many-flowered peduncles, and curiously-curved or spirally-twisted fruits. M. sativa (purple medick or lucerne) is found wild in England and Scotland, and is commonly cultivated in the fields of Europe. M. lupulina, black medick or black nonsuch, so called from the black colour of the ripe pods, grows in meadows, pastures, and waste grounds, and affords excellent fodder for sheep. It is also known, from the colour of its flower, by the name of yellow lucerne, and to farmers by that of hop-trefoil, from its resemblance to the true hop-trefoil, or yellow clover. M. arborea (tree-medick) is a villous shrubby plant, a native of the south of Europe. There are about forty species, natives of Europe, Western Asia, and Northern Africa.

Medical (med'ik-al), a. [L. medicālis, from L. medicus, pertaining to healing, from medeor, to heal, to cure; probably allied to Gr. mēdos, care, and mēdomai, to take care of.] Pertaining to, employed in, or in some way connected with medicine or the art of healing diseases; as, (a) devoted to or engaged in healing diseases; as, the medical profession; medical services. (b) Medical, tending to cure; as, the medical properties of a plant. (c) Adapted, intended, or instituted to teach medical science; as, medical schools; medical institutions.—Medical jurisprudence, the application of medical science to the administration of justice, in the determination of doubtful questions such as medical evidence is likely to throw light upon; forensic medicine.

Medically (med'ik-al-ly), adv. In a medical manner; according to the rules of the healing art, or for the purpose of healing; as, a mineral medically used or applied; a plant medically considered.

Medicament (me-dik-a-ment or med'i-kament), n. [Fr. medicament, from L. medicamentum. See MEDICAL.] Anything used for healing diseases or wounds; a medicine; a healing application.

A cruel wound was cured by scalding medicaments.
Sir W. Temple.

Medicamental (med'ik-a-ment'al), a. Relating to healing applications; having the qualities of medicaments.

Medicamentally (med'ik-a-ment'al-ly), adv. After the manner of healing applications.

Medicaster (med'ik-as-tēr), n. A quack-doctor. 'Medicasters, pretenders to physic.' Whitlock.

Medicate (med'ik-āt), v. t. pret. & pp. medicated; ppr. medicating. [L. medico, medico, from medicus. See MEDICAL.] 1. To tincture or imbue with healing substances, or with anything medicinal.

To this may be ascribed the great effects of medicated waters.
Arbuthnot.

2. To treat with medicine; to heal; to cure.

Medication (med'ik-a'shon), n. 1. The act or process of medicating or imbuing with medicinal substances; the infusion of medicinal virtues.—2. † The use or application of medicine.

He adviseth to observe the equinoxes and solstices, and to decline medication ten days before and after.
Sir T. Browne.

Medicative (med'ik-āt-iv), a. Curing; tending to cure. 'Physicians who profess to follow nature in the treatment of diseases by watching and aiding her medicative powers.' D. Stewart.

Medicean (med-i-sē'an), a. Of or pertaining to the Medici, a celebrated Florentine family, who were eminent patrons of art and literature; as, the Medicean Venus.

Medicinal (med'ik-a-bl), a. Having the properties of medicine; medicinal.

Some griefs are medicinal; that is one of them, For it doth physic love.
Shak.

Medicinal (me-dis'in-al, formerly med'sin-al or med-i-sin'al), a. [L. medicinalis.] 1. Having the property of healing or of mitigating disease; adapted to the cure or alleviation of bodily disorders; as, medicinal plants; medicinal virtues of minerals; medicinal springs.

Drop tears as fast as the Arabian trees Their medicinal gum.
Shak.

2. Pertaining to medicine.

Learned he was in medicinal lore.
Hudibras.

Medicinally (me-dis'in-al-ly), adv. In a medicinal manner; as (a) with medicinal qualities. (b) With a view to healing; as, to use a mineral medicinally.

Medicine (med'sin or med'i-sin), n. [Fr. médecine, L. medicina, from medeor, to heal. See MEDICAL.] 1. Any substance used as a remedy for disease; curative agency; remedy; physic; used by Shakspeare for a drug of any kind.

If the rascal have not given me medicine to make me love him, I'll be hanged.
Shak.

Sick, O, sick.—
If not, I'll ne'er trust medicine.
Shak.

2. The science and art of preventing, curing, or alleviating the disease of the human body; as, the study of medicine; a student of medicine. Medicine admits of numerous divisions, of which the most general are pathology, hygiene, and therapeutics (including physic, surgery, and obstetrics). See these terms.—3. The equivalent given by English writers for terms used among American Indians and other savage tribes to denote anything which is supposed to possess supernatural or mysterious power, or any ceremony performed as a charm.—Medicine seal, medicine stamp, names given to certain small, greenish, square stones found near old Roman towns and stations throughout Europe, engraved with inscriptions on one or more borders, used as seals by the old Roman physicians to stamp the names of their medicines on wax or other plastic substance.

Medicine† (med'sin), v. t. 1. To administer medicine to.—2. To cure, as by medicine.

Great griefs, I see, medicine the less.
Shak.

Medicine† (med'sin), n. [Fr. médecin.] A physician.

Meet we the medicine of the sickly weal; And with him pour we in our country's purge.
Shak.

Medicine-chest (med'sin-chest or med'i-sin-chest), n. A chest for holding medicines, together with such instruments and appliances as are necessary for the purposes of surgery.

Meditatio fugæ (med'i-tā'shō-fū'jē), [L., intention of making an escape.] In Scots law, a term applied to the position of a debtor who meditates an escape to avoid the payment of his debts. When a creditor can make oath that his debtor, whether native or foreigner, is in meditatione fugæ, or where he has reasonable ground of apprehension that the debtor has such an intention, he is entitled to a warrant to apprehend the debtor. The warrant may be obtained from any judge of the Court of Session, the sheriff, a magistrate of a burgh, or a justice of the peace, and is termed a meditatio fugæ warrant. Under the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1881, which abolishes imprisonment for debt except in a few special cases, warrants of this kind are practically obsolete.

Meditation (med'i-tā'shon), n. [L. meditatio. See MEDITATE.] The act of meditating; close or continued thought; the turning or revolving of a subject in the mind; continued mental reflection; often specifically thought devoted to religious subjects.

Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my redeemer.
Ps. xix. 14.

He is not lolling on a lewd day-bed
But on his knees at meditation.
Shak.

Mediterranean† (med'i-tē-rān'), a. Same as Mediterranean.

He that never saw the sea will not be persuaded that there is a mediterranean sea.
Hacklitt.

Mediterranean (med'i-tē-rā'nē-an), a. [L. medius, middle, and terra, land.] 1. Surrounded by or in the midst of land; inland; as, the Mediterranean Sea between Europe and Africa. The word is now applied exclusively to this particular sea, but formerly its application was quite general in the sense of 'inland.' Trench gives the following instances:—

Their buildings are for the most part of timber, for the mediterranean countreys have almost no stone.
The Kingdom of Japan.

It (Arabia) hath store of cities as well mediterranean as maritime.
Holland.

2. Pertaining to, situated on or near, dwelling about the Mediterranean Sea.

Mediterraneous (med'i-tē-rā'nē-us), a. Inland; remote from the ocean or sea. 'Mediterraneous parts.' Sir T. Browne.

Meditullium (med-i-tul'i-um), n. [L. medius, middle.] Same as Diploe.

Medium (mē-di-um), n. pl. Media or Mediums (mē-di-a, mē-di-umz). [L.] 1. Something placed or ranked between other things; as, something intervening; a mean; (a) a point or stage between two extremes; a state of due restraint; moderation; mean.

The just medium of this case lies between pride and abjection.
Sir R. L'Estrange.

But poesy between the best and worst
No medium knows; you must be last or first.
Byron.

(b) In math. a mean. See MEAN. (c) In logic, the mean or middle term of a syllogism. (d) A kind of paper of a size between demy and royal.—2. Something intervening and also serving as a means of transmission or communication; necessary means of motion or action; instrumentality of communication; agency of transmission; that by or through which anything is accomplished, conveyed, or carried on; agency; instrumentality.

Prejudice may be considered as a continual false medium of viewing things. Butler.

Specifically, (a) a person through whom the action of another being is said to be manifested and transmitted by animal magnetism, or a person through whom spiritual manifestations are claimed to be made, especially one who is said to be capable of holding intercourse with the spirits of the deceased. Some mediums claim to have the power of floating in and moving through the air, of raising tables from the ground and keeping them suspended, and of performing many other supernatural feats. (b) The liquid vehicle with which dry colours are ground and prepared for painting.—Circulating medium, coin and bank-notes, or paper convertible into money on demand; currency.

Medium (mē'di-um), a. Middle; middling; mean; as, medium size.

Medium-sized (mē'di-um-sizd), a. Of medium or middle size; of an intermediate or of an average size.

Medjidî (med-jid'î), n. A Turkish order of knighthood, instituted in 1852, and conferred on many British and other officers who took part with Turkey in the Crimean war.—2. A Turkish silver coin worth about 3s. 6d. The gold medjidî=18s.

Medlar (med'lar), n. [O.E. medle-tree, O.Fr. meslier, mesler, medler, from L. mespilus, Gr. mespilon, medlar.] A tree of the genus Mespilus, the M. germanica, which is found wild in several parts of Central Europe, and is cultivated in gardens for its fruit, which is remarkable for its acerbity when first gathered. It loses this acerbity after a few weeks' keeping, and is eaten when somewhat decayed, in which state its flavour is highly relished by some.

You'll be rotten ere you be half ripe, and that's the right virtue of the medlar. Shak.

Medle, Medley (med'l, med'li), v.t. [See MIDDLE, MEDLEY.] To mix.

The things taught by Mahomed are so mixt and confused, that it is no easy task to range them under distinct heads: And yet they are not more medley'd in themselves than disadvantageously represented by writers. L. Addison.

Medlee, t. a. [See MEDLEY.] Of a mixed stuff or colour. 'A medlee coat.' Chaucer.

Medley (med'li), n. [O.Fr. medlée, meslée; Fr. mêlée. See MELÉE, and also MELLAY, a form which is sometimes used.] 1. A mixture; a mingled and confused mass of ingredients; a jumble; a hodge-podge; used commonly with some degree of contempt. 'This medley of philosophy and war.' Addison.

Love is a medley of endearments, jars, Suspicions, quarrels, reconciliations, wars, Then peace again. Walsh.

Sometimes used in the specific sense of a kind of song made up of scraps of different songs.—2. † A hand-to-hand fight; a mêlée.

The consul for his part forswore not to come to hand-fight. The medley continued above three hours, and the hope of victory hung in equal balance. Holland.

Medley (med'li), a. Mingled; confused. [Rare.]

Quahms at my heart, convulsions in my nerves, Within my little world make medley war. Dryden.

Medley, v.t. See MEDLE.

Medoc (me-dok'), n. An excellent red French wine, from Medoc, in the department of Gironde.

Medrinaque (med'ri-nak'), n. A coarse fibre from the Philippines, obtained from the sago palm, and used chiefly for stiffening dress linings, &c. Maunder.

Medrissa, Madrissa (med-ris'sa, mad-ris'sa), n. A high school or gymnasium in Mohammedan countries for the education of youth.

Medulla (mē-dul'la), n. [L., marrow, from medius, middle.] 1. In anat. the fat substance or marrow which fills the cavity of the bones.—Medulla oblongata, the upper enlarged portion of the spinal cord.—Medulla spinalis, the spinal marrow or cord; the continuation downwards of the brain matter.—2. In bot. the pith; the central column of cellular matter over which the wood is formed in exogens.

Medullar (mē-dul'lar), a. Same as Medullary, but comparatively rare.

Medullary (mē-dul-la-ri or mē-dul'la-ri), a. [L. medullaris, from medulla (which see).] 1. Pertaining to marrow; consisting of marrow; resembling marrow; as, medullary substance. The medullary substance composes the greater part of the brain, spinal marrow, and nerves.—2. In bot. relating to the pith of plants.—Medullary sheath, a thin layer of spiral vessels formed immediately over the pith.—Medullary rays, the vertical plates of cellular tissue which connect the pith of exogenous plants with the bark.

Medulated (mē-dul'lat-ed), a. Having a medulla.

The like holds even in certain portions of the peripheral cerebro-spinal system, as the olfactory portion, which consists of an extensive plexus of non-medulated fibres, and which has the peculiarity that different parts of its area are not acted upon separately. H. Spencer.

Medullin, Medulline (mē-dul'lin), n. [From medulla (which see).] A name applied by Braconnot to the cellulose obtained from the pith or medulla of certain plants, as the sunflower and lilac.

Medullose (mē-dul'los), a. Having the texture of pith. Maunder.

Medusa (me-dū'sa), n. [Gr. Medousa, originally the fem. of medōn, a ruler.] 1. In myth. one of the three Gorgons, who is represented as having been originally a beautiful maiden, but as having had her hair changed into serpents by Athene, which made her head so horrible that every one who looked at it was turned to stone.—2. In zool. a member of the order Medusidæ (which see).

Medusa's Head, n. 1. A name sometimes applied to those species of star-fish which have the rays very much branched, as in the genus Euryale.—2. In bot. the plant Euphorbia caput Medusæ.

Medusian (me-dū'si-an), n. A member of the order Medusidæ, or jelly-fishes.

Medusidæ (me-dū'si-dē), n. pl. The jelly-fishes or sea-nettles, an order of Hydrozoa, co-extensive with the sub-class Discophora, whose hydrosome is free and oceanic, consisting of a single nectocalyx or swimming-bell, from the roof of which one or several polypites are suspended. The nectocalyx is furnished with a system of canals, and a number of tentacles depend from its margin. The reproductive organs appear as processes either of the sides of the polypite or of the nectocalycine canals. The order has been very much restricted by modern naturalists, and it is by no means improbable that it will ultimately be entirely done away with, very many of its members having been shown to be really the free generative buds of other Hydrozoa.

Medusidan (me-dū'si-dan), n. A member of the order Medusidæ.

Medusiform (me-dū'si-form), a. Resembling a medusa in shape.

Medusoid (me-dū'soid), a. Resembling a medusa.

Medusoid (me-dū'soid), n. In zool. the medusiform generative bud or receptacle of the reproductive elements of a hydrozoan, as Coryne, whether it becomes detached or not. Such organisms constitute the middle stage in the process of metagenesis. See METAGENESIS.

Meeking† (mēch'ing), p. and a. [See MICHING.] Skulking; mean; miching.

She has some meeking rascal in her house. Beau, & Fl.

Meed (mēd), n. [A. Sax. mēd, meord, O.Fr. mēda, meoda, mieda, L.G. mēde, D. miede, G. miethe, Goth. mizda, reward, recompense; allied to Gr. misthos, pay, hire; O.Slav. mizda, Bohem. mzda, Pol. myto, Zend mizdha, reward, gain; perhaps from a root mas, allied to Skr. mā, to measure.] 1. That which is bestowed or rendered in consideration of merit or excellence of any kind; reward; recompense; award.

Here comes to-day, Pallas and Aphrodite, claiming each This meed of fairest. Tennyson.

Meerkat (mēr'kat), n. [D. meer, sea, and kat, a cat.] A South African animal of the genus Cynictis (C. Levallantis), allied to the ichneumon. Its tail is bushy and of remarkable length. See CYNICTIS.

Meerscham (mēr'sham), n. [G., lit. sea-foam—meer, the sea, and scham, foam.] 1. A hydrated silicate of magnesium, consisting of 60.9 parts silica, 26.1 magnesium, and 12.0 water, occurring as a fine white clay. It is found in Europe, but occurs chiefly at Eski-Shehr, in Asia Minor, and when dug out is soft, and makes lather-like soap. From its having been found on the sea-shore in some places in peculiarly rounded snow-white lumps, it was supposed to be petrified sea-foam, hence its German name. It is manufactured into tobacco-pipes, which are boiled in oil or wax, and baked.—2. The name given to the pipe itself.

See—what a meerscham! This belonged to a poor fellow I knew at Bonn. Hannay.

Meet (mēt), a. [A. Sax. gemet, fit, proper, mette, moderate; Icel. metr, meet, worthy, from metan, Icel. mæta, Goth. mitan, to measure. See METE.] Fit; suitable; proper; qualified; convenient; adapted; appropriate.

Ye shall pass over armed before your brethren the children of Israel, all that are meet for the war. Deut. xii. 18.

It was meet that we should make merry. Luke xv. 32.

O Caledonia! stern and wild, Meet nurse for a poetic child! Sir W. Scott.

—Meet with, t. even with.

Well, I shall be meet with your mumbling mouth one day. B. Fensom.

Meet (mēt), v.t. pret. & pp. met; ppp. meeting. [A. Sax. mētan, pret. mētte, to meet, from mōt, a meeting, a mote or moot; so Icel. mōta, from mōt, a meeting; O.Fris. mētan, Dan. møde, Sw. möta, Goth. motjan, gamotjan, to meet.] 1. To come together with by approach in an opposite direction; to come face to face with; to come in contact with; to join; as, I met him coming up while I was going down; I met several of my friends to-day; I had arranged to meet them there.

His daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and with dances. Judg. xi. 34.

2. To come together with in any place; as, we met many strangers at the levee.—3. To come in hostile contact with; to encounter; to confront; to join battle with; as, the British troops met the French at Waterloo.—4. To find; to light on; to get, gain, or receive; as, the good man meets his reward; the criminal in due time meets the punishment he deserves.

Of vice or virtue, whether blest or curst, Which meets contempt, or which compassion first. Pope.

5. To be equal or equivalent to; to satisfy; to gratify; to answer; as, to meet a demand; to meet one's views, wishes, and the like.

This day he requires a large sum to meet demands that cannot be denied. Lord Lytton.

Fâte, fâr, fât, fâl; mē, met, hér; pine, pin; nôto, not, môve; tûbe, tub, bûll; oil, pound; ū, Sc. abune; ŷ, Sc. fey.

—To meet the ear, to strike the ear; hence, fig. to be explicitly expressed.

And if aught else great bards beside
In sage and solemn tunes have sung,
Of turnneys and of trophies hung,
Of forests and enchantments drear,
Where more is meant than meets the ear. Milton.

—To meet the eye, to arrest the sight; to come into notice; to become visible. 'Little's leadless pistol met his eye.' Byron.—To meet half-way, to approach from an equal distance and meet; fig. to make mutual and equal concessions, each party renouncing some pretensions; to make a compromise with.

Meet (mēt), v.i. 1. To come together by mutual approach; to come face to face; to join each other.

And for the rest o' the fleet
Which I dispersed, they all have met again,
And are upon the Mediterranean fote. Shak.

2. To come together in hostility; to encounter; as, the armies met at Waterloo, and decided the fate of Bonaparte.

Weapons more violent, when next we meet,
May serve to better us, and worse our foes. Milton.

3. To assemble; to congregate; as, Parliament will meet on the first Wednesday of February.—4. To come together by being extended; to come in contact; to join; as, two converging lines will meet in a point.—To meet with, (a) to light on; to find; to come to; often with the sense of an unexpected event.

We met with many things worthy of observation. Bacon.

4. In England, an assembly of Dissenters.—5. In the United States, an assembly for public worship generally.—6. A hostile encounter; a duel.—SYN. Interview, conference, assembly, company, convention, congregation, auditory, junction, confluence, union.

Meeting-house (mēt'ing-hous), n. A place of worship; a church; applied in England to a house of public worship for Dissenters, as distinguished from a church.

His heart misgave him that the churches were so many meeting-houses, but I soon made him easy. Addison.

Meetly (mēt'li), adv. In a meet or fit manner; fitly; suitably; properly.

See then all this contrariety of sects meetly well reconciled. Bp. Beall.

Meetness (mēt'nes), n. The state or quality of being meet; fitness; suitability; propriety.

Megacephalous (meg-a-sef'a-lus), a. [Gr. megas, great, and kephalē, the head.] Large-headed; a term applied specifically to plants with large flower-heads, and animals with large heads.

Megaceros (me-gas'e-ros), n. [Gr. megas, great, and keras, a horn.] An extinct genus of deer, formed for the Irish deer, Irish stag, or Irish elk (M. hibernicus), whose remains occur in the bogs of Scotland and shell marl of Ireland below the peat or bog earth. From the horns being very wide and flattened, like those of the moose or elk, it was formerly erroneously supposed to have been a variety of that animal. Specimens have been found measuring from the foot to the summit of the antlers 10 feet 4 inches, and from 10 to 12 feet between the tips.

Megachile (meg-a-kī'lē), n. [Gr. megas, great, and cheilos, a lip.] A genus of bees, several of whose species, together with species of an allied genus (Osmia), are popularly known as leaf-cutter bees, from their habit of cutting off pieces of the leaves of the rose, elm, &c., which they stick together and roll into cases to form their nests in the trunks of decayed trees and old rotten palings. The nest of one species (M. muraria) is composed of grains of sand glued together with its viscid saliva, and is so hard as not to be easily penetrated by a knife. Another species (M. Willughbiella) is called the willow-bee, because it frequently constructs its cells in willow-trees. The males have generally dilated tarsi. There are many exotic species of this genus.

Megacosm (meg-a-kōzm), n. [Gr. megas, great, and kosmos, world.] The great world; macrocosm. Bp. Croft.

Megalanea (meg-a-lā'nē-a), n. Professor Owen's name for an extinct gigantic land-lizard occurring in the pleistocene deposits of Australia. Its remains indicate its length to have been about 20 feet.

Megalesian (meg-a-lē'si-an), a. [L. megalēsius, from Gr. Megalē, the Great, an epithet applied to Cybele.] Of or belonging to Cybele, the mother of the gods.—Megalesian games, in Rom. antiq. a magnificent festival, with games, celebrated at Rome in the month of April, and lasting for six days, in honour of Cybele. The games were scenic and not circensian.

Megalichthys (meg-a-lik'this), n. [Gr. megas, great, and ichthys, a fish.] A genus of fossil ganoid fishes of the carboniferous period, occurring most abundantly in the lower beds, characterized by large smooth, but minutely punctured, enamelled scales, some of which have been found as large as 5 inches in diameter, indicating a fish of great size. The jaws were furnished with immense laniary teeth, closely resembling, but much larger than, those of the largest modern reptile. Several species have been described from the carboniferous strata of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and the centre of England.

Megalith (meg'a-lith), n. [Gr. megas, great, lithos, stone.] A great block of stone; a rude monumental stone; a stone used in the so-called Cyclopean structures or in a cromlech, &c. See CROMLECH, DOLMEN.

Megalithic (meg-a-lith'ik), a. [See above.] Consisting of large stones; specifically, applied to ancient structures or monuments consisting of large unhewn stones, including menhirs, cromlechs, dolmens, and the so-called Cyclopean architecture of the Greeks, &c.

Megalonyx (meg-a-lon'iks), n. [Gr. megalē, great, and onyx, a nail—so named from the great size of its claw bones.] A genus of fossil edentate mammals, allied to the sloth, but adapted for a terrestrial instead of an arboreal life, found in the upper tertiary of America. It appears to have somewhat resembled the Megatherium, but to have been about a third smaller.

Megalophonous (meg-a-lof'o-nus), a. [Gr. megas, megalē, great, and phōnē, voice.] Having a loud voice. Smart.

Megalopolis (meg-a-lop'o-lis), n. [Gr. megas, megalē, great, and polis, city.] A chief city; a metropolis.

Megalopsychy (meg-a-lop'si-ki), n. [Gr. megas, megalē, great, and psychē, the soul.] Magnanimity; greatness of soul. [Rare.]

Megalosaur (meg'a-lō-sār), n. A fossil carnivorous animal of the genus Megalosaurus.

Megalosaurus (meg'a-lō-sā'rus), n. [Gr. megas, megalē, great, and sauros, a lizard.] A genus of fossil deinosaurian reptiles, combining the characters of the monitors and crocodiles, found in the oolite and Wealden strata. Only one species, the Megalosaurus, has been referred to the genus. Its length has been estimated at between 40 and 50 feet, the femur and tibia each measuring about 3 feet in length, giving a length of almost two yards to the hind leg. Its powerful, pointed, and trenchant teeth indicate its carnivorous habits, and from its gigantic size and strength it must have been very destructive to other animals.

1, Megalosaurus restored. 2, Tooth of do. 3, Jaw of do.

Megalotis (meg-a-lō'tis), n. [Gr. megas, great, and ōtis, an ear.] A genus of African digitigrade carnivorous mammals belonging to the Canidae or dog family, characterized by the large size of their ears; the fennecs. They resemble the fox in general form, and in having a bushy tail, but their large bright black eyes are adapted for diurnal, not for nocturnal vision. They are about 10 inches long and 5 high, and feed mostly on insects, especially the locust, but partly on dates and other vegetable food.

Megaphyton (meg-a-fīt'on), n. [Gr. megas, great, and phyton, a plant.] An extinct genus of plants, belonging to the order Coniferæ, found in the coal-measures.

Megapode (meg'a-pod), n. A gallinaceous bird of the genus Megapodius (which see).

Megapodidae (meg-a-pod'i-dē), n. pl. [See MEGAPODIUS.] A family of birds peculiar to Australia and the adjacent islands; the mound birds. Besides the jungle-fowl (Megapodius, which see) it comprises the brush turkey of the colonists (Talegalla Lathamii) (see BRUSH-TURKEY) and the native pheasant (Leipoa ocellata). (See LEIPOA.) The family may be regarded as the Australian representative of the Phasianidae.

Megapodius (meg-a-pō'di-us), n. [Gr. megas, great, and pous, podos, a foot.] A genus of rasorial birds with large feet. The best known and most remarkable species is the Australian jungle-fowl (M. tumulus), a large bird, remarkable for erecting considerable mounds, composed of earth, stones, Jungle-fowl (Megapodius tumulus).

decayed leaves, &c., sometimes 15 feet high and 150 in circumference, and in the centre of which, at a depth of 2 or 3 feet, it deposits its eggs, leaving them to be hatched by the heat of the fermenting vegetable mass. These mounds are very abundant in the islands about Endeavour Strait and round Cape York, as well as on the neighbouring mainland, and were at first taken for sepulchral tumuli.

Megalopolis (meg-ap'o-lis), n. [Gr. megas, great, and polis, a city.] A metropolis.

Amadavad . . . is at this present the megalopolis of Cambaya. Sir T. Herbert.

Megaptera (me-gap'tēr-a), n. [Gr. megas, great, and pteron, a wing, a fin.] A genus of whales of the family Balenidae, including the hump-backed whales, remarkable for the great length of their flippers, which measure from one-fifth to one-third the entire length of the body.

Megarian, Megaric (me-gā'ri-an, me-gar'ik), a. Of or belonging to Megara, a city of ancient Greece.—Megarian school, a school of philosophy founded at Megara by Euclid, a native of the city, and a disciple of Socrates. It was remarkable for the subtlety of its logic.

Megascopus (meg-a-skōp), n. [Gr. megas, great, and skopē, to view.] A modification of the solar microscope for the examination of bodies of considerable dimensions.

Megaspore (meg-a-spōr), n. [Gr. megas, great, and spora, a seed.] One of the larger kind of reproductive spores found in lycopods.

Megass, Megasse (me-gas'), n. Same as Bagasse.

Megasthene (meg-as-thēn), n. [Gr. megas, great, and sthenos, strength.] In zool. a member of one of the four groups (Archonts, Megasthenes, Microsthenes, Ootiooids) into which Dana has classified mammals, including the larger and more powerful of the class, and comprising the orders Quadrumana, Carnivora, Herbivora or Ungulata, and Cetacea or Mutilata; specially opposed to Microsthenes. See MICROSTHENE.

Megasthenic (meg-as-thēn'ik), a. In zool. of or belonging to the megasthenes.

Megatheriidae (meg-a-thē'ri-i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. megas, great, therion, a wild beast, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of extinct mammiferous quadrupeds, including Megatherium, Megalonyx, Myloodon, &c.

Megatherium (meg-a-thē'ri-um), n. [Gr. megas, great, and therion, a wild beast.] A fossil genus of edentate mammals, allied to the sloths, but having feet adapted for walking on the ground, found in the upper tertiary or pampean deposits of South America. It was about 8 feet high, and its body 12 to 18 feet long. Its teeth prove that it lived on vegetables, and its fore-feet, about a yard in length and armed with gigantic claws, show that roots were its chief objects of search.

Megatheroid (meg-a-thē'roid), n. A fossil mammal belonging to the family Megatheriidae. Also written Megatheroid.

Meggelup (meg-gel-up), n. Same as Maglip.

Megilp, Megilph (mē-gilp', mē-gilf'). Same as Maglip.

Megrim (mē'grim), n. [Fr. migraine, corrupted from L. hemicranium, Gr. hemicranion, half the head—hēmi, half, and kranion, the head or cranium.] 1. A neuralgic pain in the side of the head; periodical headache, characterized by a vehement pain confined to one side of the head, sometimes to one side of the forehead, and usually periodical, that is, either exacerbating and remitting, or absolutely intermittent.

He accused some of giving all their customers colics and megrims. Tatler.

2. pl. In farriery, a name given to a sudden attack of sickness in a horse at work, when he reels, and either stands still for a minute dull and stupid, or falls to the ground insensible. These attacks are often periodical, but are most frequent in warm weather, either when the horse is drawing uphill or has been exposed to the full rays of a hot sun.—3. † A whim; a crotchety; a freak.

These are his megrims, firks, and melancholies. Ford.

4. Cornish name of the scaldfish or smooth sole (Psetta argiolosa).

Meibomian (mi-bō'mi-an), a. In anat. a term applied to the small glands lying under the inner membrane of the eyelids, first described by Meibomius.

Meikle (mīk'l), a. [See MICKLE.] Much; great; large; big; pre-eminent. [Old English and Scotch.]

Meinet (mē'ne), n. Same as Meiny.

Melonite (mī'ōn-it), n. [Gr. meion, less—from its low pyramids.] A prismato-pyramidal mineral of the scapolite group, of a grayish-white colour. It occurs massive and crystallized.

Melosis (mī'ō'sis), n. [Gr., from meion, less.] Diminution; a rhetorical figure, a species of hyperbole, representing a thing less than it is.

Melostemonous, Miostemonous (mī'ō-stēn-on-us), a. [Gr. meion, less, and stemon, a thread.] A term applied to plants in which the stamens are less in number than the petals.

Meith, Meeth (mēth), n. [From mete, to measure (which see).] A mark; a sign; a landmark or boundary; as, meeths and marches.

Meiwell (mī'wel), n. A small sort of codfish.

Meke, † a. Meek; humble.

Meke, † v.t. To become meek.

Mekhtarist (mek-it'ar-ist), n. See MECHTARIST.

Melaconite, Melaconise (me-lak'on-it, me-lak'on-iz), n. [Gr. melas, black, and konis, powder.] (CuO.) A black or grayish-black, impure, earthy oxide of copper, found in Vesuvian lava, and abundantly in veins in powdery cubes or masses at Kewenaw Point, Lake Superior, and probably resulting from the decomposition of other ores. Its specific gravity is 6.25.

Melada (me-lā'da), n. [Sp., pp. of melar, to candy, from L. mel, honey.] Crude or impure sugar as it comes from the pans, consisting of a mixture of sugar and molasses.

Melæna (me-lē'na), n. [Gr. melas, melaina, black.] Black vomit: a term adopted by Sauvages from Hippocrates to denote the occurrence of dark-coloured, grumous, and pitchy evacuations, generally accompanied by vomiting of black-coloured bloody matter. The black vomit in yellow fever is owing to a morbid secretion from the lining membrane of the stomach and small intestines mixed with blood.

Melah (mē'la), n. In the East Indies, a fair, or an assembly of pilgrims, partly for religious and partly for commercial purposes.

Melainotype (me-lā'nō-tip), n. [Gr. melaina, black, and typos, an impression.] In photog. a positive process, of American origin, deriving its name from the black colour of the material which supports the picture. Very thin sheets of iron are coated on both sides with a kind of black Japan varnish. The side which is to receive the collodion must be very smooth and highly polished. When collodionized, excited, and in every way treated as in a positive process on glass, these plates yield beautiful results, and possess the great advantage of being less fragile than glass plates.

Melaleuca (me-lā-lū'ka), n. [Gr. melas, black, and leukos, white—because the trunk is black and the branches white.] A large Australian genus of trees and shrubs, nat. order Myrtaceæ. They have alternate or opposite flat or cylindrical leaves, and yellowish, purplish, or crimson flowers, in spikes or heads. One species (M. cajuputi) is found also in the Indian Archipelago and the Malay Peninsula. From this cajuput-oil is procured. See CAJUPUT.

Melambo-bark (me-lam'bō-bärk), n. See Malambo-bark.

Melampode (mel'am-pōd'), n. Black hellebore. Spenser.

Melampodium (mel-am-pō'di-um), n. [Gr. melampodion—melas, black, and podion, dim. of pous, podos, a foot.] 1. A genus of Composite, consisting of coarse dichotomous annual or perennial herbs. There are nearly twenty species, natives mostly of tropical America.

Melampyrum (mel-am-pī'rum), n. [Gr. melas, black, and pyros, wheat.] A genus of annual plants, nat. order Scrophulariaceæ, having opposite narrow leaves, yellow or pinkish flowers, and a two-celled capsule, with a few seeds somewhat resembling wheat. They grow in woods, cornfields, pastures, &c., and are natives of the northern temperate regions, four species being found in Britain, where they are popularly known as cow-wheat. They are said to be excellent food for cattle, imparting a richness to milk and butter.

Melanagogue (mel'an-a-gog), n. [Fr. melanagogue, from Gr. melas, melan, black, and agogos, driving, from ago, to drive.] A medicine supposed to expel black bile or choler.

Melanicholia (mel-an-kō'li-a), n. Melancholy, especially morbid melancholy.

Melanicholiant (mel-an-kō'li-an), n. A melancholic (which see). 'Our religious melanicholians.' Dr. J. Scott.

Melanicholic (mel'an-kol-ik), a. 1. Disordered by melancholy; depressed in spirits; affected with gloom; dejected; hypochondriac.—2. Produced by melancholy; expressive of melancholy; suggestive of melancholy; sombre; gloomy; mournful; as, melancholic strains. 'Our melancholic friend Propercius.' B. Jonson.

Just as the melancholic eye
Sees fleets and armies in the sky. Prior.

3. † Unhappy; unfortunate; causing sorrow. 'Accidents and melancholic perplexities.' Clarendon.

Melanicholic (mel'an-kol-ik), n. 1. One affected with a gloomy state of mind. 'Melanicholics, superstitious, or infirm persons.' Dr. Spencer.—2. A gloomy state of mind.

My condition is much worse than yours . . . and will very well justify the melancholic that I confess to you, possesses me. Clarendon.

Melanicholly (mel'an-kol-i-li), adv. In a melancholy manner; with melancholy. 'Melanicholly inclining her cheek to her right hand.' Keepe.

Melanicholiness (mel'an-kol-i-nes), n. State of being melancholy; disposition to indulge gloominess of mind.

When a boy, he (Hobbes) was playmate enough; but wital he had then a contemplative melancholiness. Aubrey.

Melanicholious (mel-an-kō'li-us), a. Gloomy; melancholy; generally used in a ludicrous sense. 'A melancholious tone.' Thackeray. 'A lengthened, melancholious squeal.' H. Miller.

Melanicholist (mel'an-kol-ist), n. One affected with melancholy.

The melancholist was afraid to sit down for fear of being broken. Clanville.

These insects chiefly reside beneath the bark of trees. One species (Melandrya caraboides) is found in this country.

Melanerpinæ (mel'an-er-pi'ne), n. pl. [Gr. melas, melanos, black, and herpō, to creep.] An American sub-family of scansorial birds of the family or order Picidæ; black wood-peckers.

Melanesian (mē-lā-nē'si-an), n. [Gr. melas, black, and nēos, an island.] The term applied to a family of languages spoken by the inhabitants of numerous islands in the Pacific and Indian Oceans.

Mélange (mā-lāzh), n. [Fr., from mêler, to mix. See MÊLÉE.] A mixture.

Melania (mē-lā-ni-a), n. [Gr. melas, melan, black.] A genus of fluviatile, operculate gastropods. The name is derived from the black colour of the species. See MELANIDÆ.

Melanian (mē-lā-ni-an), n. A gastropod of the family Melanidæ.

Melanic (mel-an'ik), a. Of or pertaining to melanosis.—Melanic deposit, a black colouring matter deposited from the blood under special circumstances. See MELANOSIS.

Melanidæ, Melaniidæ (mel-an'i-dē, mel-an'i-dē), n. pl. A family of pectinibranchiate gastropods, of the section Holostomata and order Prosobranchiata, characterized by the shell being spiral and turreted, the aperture often channelled or notched in front, outer lip acute, and operculum horny and spiral. It comprises two genera, Melania and Paludomus.

Melaniline (mel-an'i-lin), n. [Gr. melas, black, and E. aniline.] (C₁₂H₁₃N₃). A basic substance obtained from chloride of cyanogen and aniline.

Melanism (mel'an-izm), n. [Gr. melas, melan, black.] In physiol. an undue development of colouring material in the skin and its appendages: the opposite of albinism.

Melanite (mel'an-it), n. [Gr. melas, melan, black.] A mineral, an iron-alumina variety of garnet, of a velvet black or grayish black, occurring always in crystals of a dodecahedral form. Melanite is perfectly opaque. It is found among volcanic substances, chiefly near Albano and Frascati, in the neighbourhood of Rome.

Melanochroic (mel'an-ō-kro'ik), a. [Gr. melas, melanos, black, and chroia, colour.] One of the divisions into which Professor Huxley classifies the races of men; it includes the dark whites, and is supposed by him to be sprung from an intermixture of his Australioids and Xanthochroics.

Melanochroite (mel'an-ō-kro'it), n. [See MELANOCROIC.] (PbCrO₄). A basic chromate of lead, found at Beresof in the Ural.

Melanoma (mel'an-ō-ma), n. Same as Melanosis.

Melanopathy (mel'an-op'a-thi), n. [Gr. melas, melanos, black, and pathos, affection.] A disease of the skin, which consists in augmentation of black pigment, generally in patches. Dunglison.

Melanopsis (mel'an-op'sis), n. [Gr. melas, melan, black, and opsis, appearance.] A genus of fresh-water, testaceous, turbinated molluscs, found in the south of Europe, and especially near the Mediterranean. They occur fossil in most of the tertiary beds of Europe.

Melanorrhœa (mel'an-ō-rē'a), n. [Gr. melas, melanos, black, and rhœa, to flow.] A genus of very large Indian trees, belonging to the nat. order Anacardiaceæ. It includes M. usitatissima, or black-varnish tree—the theet-tree of Burmah and khew of Manipoor—which produces a wood of a dark colour, so hard that native anchors are made of it, and yields when tapped a varnish which becomes black on exposure, and is much valued for lacquering boats, vessels designed to contain liquids, articles of furniture, and the like.

Melanosis (mel-an-ō'sis), n. [Gr., a growing black, from melas, melanos, black.] In pathol. an organic affection, due to the softening of the tissue of the part through disease, especially tubercles, in which the tissue is converted into a black, hard, homogeneous substance, near which ulcers or cavities may form. The lungs are the chief seat of this affection.

Melanosperm (mel-an-ō-spér-m), n. [Gr. melas, melanos, black, and sperma, seed.] An alga belonging to the division Melanospermeæ.

Melanospermeæ (mel-an-ō-spér-m'ē-ē), n. pl. A division of algae, characterized by their dark olivaceous spores. This division contains many of the largest and most important algae, especially the large brown seaweeds which seem in all countries to form the extreme limit of seaweed growth.

Melanotic (mel-an-ō'tik), a. Relating to melanosis.

Melanotype (mel-an-ō-tip), n. Same as Melanotype.

Melanterite (mē-lan'tér-it), n. [Gr. melas, melan, black.] A mineralogical name of the native sulphate of iron.

Melanthaceæ (mel-an-thā'sē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. melanthēs, having black blossoms—melas, black, and anthos, a flower.] A nat. order of poisonous endogens, consisting of bulbous, tuberous, and fibrous rooted plants, with or without stems, and having parallel-veined leaves. The fruit is a three-parted capsule. There are about 130 species, natives of all parts of the world, some of which resemble crocuses and some small lilies. The most important species are medical plants, as the meadow-saffron (Colchicum autumnale), white hellebore (Veratrum album), and cevadilla (Asagrea officinalis). The root of Helonia dioica is used in North America as a tonic and anthelmintic.

Melanthaceous (mel-an-thā'shus), a. In bot. of or belonging to the order Melanthaceæ.

Melanure, Melanurus (mel'a-nūr, mel-a-nū'rus), n. [Gr. melas, melan, black, and oura, a tail.] A small fish of the Mediterranean, the Sparus melanurus of Linnaeus, a species of gilthead.

Melaphyre (mē-lā-fir), n. A compact black or blackish-gray trap-rock, consisting of a matrix of labradorite and augite, in which are imbedded crystals of the same minerals, and sometimes uniaxial mica, hornblende, and iron pyrites. It contains less iron and is of less specific gravity than dolerite, into which it sometimes passes.

Mela-rosa, Mella-rosa (mel'a-rō-za), n. [It. mela, an apple, and rosa, a rose.] The fruit of a tree of the genus Citrus, probably a variety of the lime (C. Limetta, or sweet lime), cultivated in Italy, and deriving its name from its fragrance resembling that of a rose.

Melas (mē-las), n. [Gr., black.] An endemic disease of Arabia, characterized by dark or black spots on the skin.

Melasma (mē-las'ma), n. [Gr., a black or livid spot, from melas, black.] A disease of aged persons, in which a black spot appears upon the skin, especially of the extremities, which soon forms a foul ulcer. Called also Melasma.

Melasmic (mē-las'mik), n. See MELASMA.

Melasoma (mē-las-sō'ma), n. [Gr. melas, black, and sōma, body.] A very extensive family of heteromerous coleoptera, so called from the black colour of the species; it is the Tenebrionidæ of Leach. It contains three large genera, Pimelia, Blaps, and Tenebrio.

Melasses (mē-las'ez), n. sing. [Fr. mélasse, It. mellassa, from L. mel, honey.] Same as Molasses.

Melastoma (mē-las'tō-ma), n. [Gr. melas, black, and stoma, mouth, from the fruit of some of the species, when eaten, staining the lips black.] A genus of plants of about forty species, natives of tropical Asia, North Australia, and Oceania, the type of the nat. order Melastomaceæ. They are shrubs, usually covered with harsh hairs; the flowers are large, white, rose-coloured or purple, and the entire leaves three to seven nerved. The leaves of M. malabathricæ, an East Indian species, are used by the natives where it grows as a remedy in diarrhoea, dysentery, and mucous discharges.

Melastomaceæ (mē-las'tō-mā'sē-ē), n. pl. An extensive nat. order of polypetalous exogens, nearly related to Myrtaceæ, but they differ remarkably in the anthers, which usually open by pores, and are inflexed in bud, while the stamens are usually declinate and of two forms. They are shrubs or trees, rarely herbs, with opposite or whorled leaves, often prominently three or five nerved, and often handsome flowers. They receive their name from the fruit of some of the species staining the lips of a black or deep purple colour. The species, of which about 1200 are known, abound chiefly in tropical countries, especially in South and West America.

Melastomaceous (mel'a-stō-mā'shus), a. Belonging or relating to the nat. order Melastomaceæ.

Melchisedician (mel-kiz'e-di'shan), n. One of a sect in the third century who affirmed Melchisedec to be Christ, or the Holy Ghost, and paid him divine adoration. Some regarded him as even superior to Christ. Written also Melchizedecian.

Melchite (mēlk'it), n. One of an eastern sect of Christians who, while adhering to the ceremonies and liturgy of the Greek Church, acknowledge the authority of the pope. The name is also given to such members of the Greek community as are Roman Catholics.

Melchizedecian (mel-kiz'e-di'shan), n. Same as Melchisedician.

Melder (mēl'der), n. [Icel. meldr, flour or corn in the mill, from mala, to grind. See MEAL.] The quantity of meal ground at one time. [Scotch.]

That ilka melder, wi' the miller,
Thou sat as lang as thou had siller. Burns.

Mele,† n. Meal; dinner, &c. Chaucer.

Meleagrina (mē-lē-gri'nē), n. pl. A sub-family of the Phasianidæ, or pheasant family, comprising the turkeys and guinea-fowl.

Meleagris (mē-lē-ā'gris), n. A genus of birds of the family Phasianidæ, including the turkeys. See TURKEY.

Mélee (mā-lā), n. [Fr., a participial substantive from mêler, to mix, O. Fr. miesler, Fr. miesclar, L. L. misculare, a freq. of miscere, to mix.] A fight in which the combatants are mingled in one confused mass; a hand-to-hand conflict; an affray; a scuffle; a mella.

Meleguetta-pepper (mē-lē-gwet'a-pep'ér), n. Same as Malaguetta-pepper.

Melena (mē-lē'na), n. Same as Melæna.

Meles (mē-lēs), n. [L., a badger.] A genus of plantigrade mammals forming according to some zoologists the type genus of the family Melidæ, but by others referred to the family Ursidæ (bears), forming a sort of connecting link between them and the weasels and otters (Mustelidæ; the badgers. See BADGER).

Meletian (mē-lē'shan), n. Eccles. (a) a follower of Meletius, an Egyptian bishop, who refused to hold communion with the lapsed on their repentance. (b) A follower of St. Meletius in the schism of Antioch in the fifth century.

Mele-tide,† n. [Mele, for meal, and tide, time.] Meal-time. Chaucer.

Melia (mē-li-a), n. [Gr., the ash, from the resemblance of the leaves.] A small genus of trees, nat. order Meliaceæ, natives of tropical Asia and Australia. M. Azadirachta, or margosa, is an evergreen which grows to the height of 40 feet, and bears white flowers. It is a native of the East Indies. Its bark yields a bitter used as a tonic, its seeds yield a valuable oil, and its trunk a tenacious gum. M. Azedarach, sometimes called Persian Ulac, pride of India, and bead-tree, is a native of the north of India, and much cultivated in the southern parts of the United States, as well as in southern Europe. The bark of the root is said to be a powerful vermifuge.

Meliaceæ (mē-li-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of polypetalous dicotyledons, distinguished by their stamens being united into a tube. It consists of shrubs and trees chiefly inhabiting tropical Asia and America, and the species possess bitter, tonic, and astringent properties. They have small paniculate flowers, and often pinnate leaves.

Melibean, Melibeian (mē-li-bē'an), a. [After Melibeus, one of the interlocutors in the first eclogue of Virgil.] In rhet. and poetry, alternate; alternately responsive; alternating.

And Danton rises and speaks, and Collet d'Herbois rises, and Curate Grégoire, and Jean Couthon of the mountain rises; and in rapid Melibeian stanzas, only a few lines each, they propose motions not a few. Carlyle.

ch, chain; ch, Sc. lock; g, go; j, job;

h, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

Melico (mel'ik), a. [Gr. melikos, from melos, a song.] Relating to song; lyric.

Melica (mel'i-ka), n. [It. melica, the great millet, from L. mel, honey.] A genus of grasses, two species of which, M. uniflora, much liked by cattle, and M. nutans, of rarer occurrence, are found in Britain. M. altissima, a Siberian species, attaining a height of 3 or 4 feet, has been introduced into Europe, and yields a considerable bulk of herbage.

Meliceris (me-lis'er-is), n. [Gr. melikēris—meli, honey, and kēros, wax.] In pathol. an encysted tumour, the contents of which resemble wax or honey in consistence.

Melicerous (me-lis'er-us), a. [See MELICERIS.] A term applied to a tumour inclosed in a cyst, and consisting of matter like honey.

Melico-grass (mel'ik-gras), n. See MELICA.

Melidæ (mel'i-dē), n. pl. [L. meles, a badger, or a martin. See MELES.] A family of plantigrade animals characterized by their elongated bodies and short legs, and by the fact that they have a carnassial tooth with a partly cutting edge, while in the bears all the teeth are equally tuberculate. It includes according to some zoologists the badgers, the glutton or wolverine, the grison, and the ratsels or honey-badgers, which, however, by others are classed under different families.

Mellitæ (mel'i-lit), n. See MELLITE.

Melliot (mel'i-lot), n. [Gr. mellitōton, mellitōtos, a kind of clover, so called from the quantity of honey it contained—meli, honey, and lōtos, lotus.] A plant of the genus Mellitotus (which see).

Mellitotus (mel-i-lō'tus), n. A genus of leguminous plants, sub-order Papilionaceæ, differing from the clovers in having racemose flowers. The common yellow melliot (M. officinalis) grows wild in woods, hedges, and neglected fields in Britain and most parts of Europe. It was formerly used as a medicine, as an ingredient in plasters, poultices, and emollient fomentations. White melliot (M. vulgaris or leucaantha), common in some parts of Europe, has become naturalized in Britain. It has been recommended as a fodder plant under the names of Cabul and Bokhara clover. M. cærulea is employed in giving its peculiar flavour and odour to the Swiss cheese known as sap-sago.

Meliorate (mēl'yor-āt), v. t. pret. & pp. meliorated; ppr. meliorating. [L. melioro, melioratum, to make better, from melior, better, compar. of bonus, good.] To make better; to improve; to ameliorate; as, to meliorate fruit by grafting, or soil by cultivation.

Nature by art we nobly meliorate. Denham.
The pure and benign light of revelation has had a meliorating influence on mankind. Washington.

Meliorate (mēl'yor-āt), v. i. To grow better.

Meliorator, Meliorator (mēl'yor-āt-ēr), n. One who meliorates.

Melioration (mēl'yor-ā'shon), n. [L. melioratio, meliorationis, a bettering, from melioro, to better. See MELIORATE.] 1. The act or operation of making or becoming better; improvement; amelioration.

A direct discouragement of melioration, as directly as if the law said in express terms, Thou shalt not improve. Burke.

2. pl. In Scots law, a term generally used to signify improvements made by a tenant upon the land or farm which he rents, and for which he is in certain cases entitled to recompense from the landlord.

Meliority (mēl'yor-i-ti), n. [L. melioritas, from L. melior, better.] The state of being better.

This colour of meliority and pre-eminence is a sign of weakness. Bacon.

Melon (mel'on), n. [Fr. melon, L. melo, an apple-shaped melon, Gr. melon, an apple or apple-shaped fruit.] A plant, Cucumis Melo, nat. order Cucurbitaceæ. It is an herbaceous, succulent, climbing or trailing annual, cultivated for its fruit in hot eastern countries from time immemorial. The fruit is the richest and most highly flavoured of all the fleshy fruits. There are many varieties of the melon, as the Canteloup, which is reckoned the best, Egyptian, Salonica, and Persian, each of which includes several varieties. In this climate the melon, to be raised to perfection, requires the aid of artificial heat and glass throughout every stage of its culture. The water-melon is the Citrullus vulgaris.—Musk-melon, a variety of Cucumis Melo.

Melon-thistle (mel'on-this'l), n. A name common to the melon-shaped cactuses, as those of the genus Melocactus (which see).

Melopiano (mel'ō-pi-ā-nō), n. [Gr. melos, a song, and E. piano.] An invention by which sustained sounds can be produced on a pianoforte. It consists of a series of small hammers set into rapid vibration by winding up a spring. When a key is struck and held down the constant repetition of the blows of the hammer causes a continuous vibration of the string, producing a sustained sound.

Melopoia (mel'ō-pē-ia), n. [Gr. melopoia, from melos, a song, and poieō, to make.] The art of composing melody.

Melotype (mel'ō-tip), n. A photographic process in which the dark chamber is dispensed with, as the pictures can be developed at any time after they are taken. It is especially valuable to tourists for use in the field.

Melt (melt), v. t. [A. Sax. meltan, miltan, also smeltan.] Allied to Gr. mēldō, to liquefy; also to malō, mellōw, &c., the s according to Pott representing a preposition.] 1. To reduce from a solid to a liquid or flowing state by heat; to liquefy; to dissolve; to fuse; as, to melt wax, tallow, or lead; to melt ice or snow.—2. Fig. To soften, as by a warming and kindly influence; to render gentle or susceptible to mild influences, as to love, pity, or tenderness.

For pity melts the mind to love. Dryden.

3. To waste away; to dissipate. Shak.

Melt, Dissolve, Thaw.—'Two words, . . . popularly confounded, though scientifically very distinct, are melt and dissolve. The former signifies to bring a substance from a solid to a liquid condition by the agency of heat alone; the latter signifies the bringing about this result by distributing the particles of the substance acted on among the particles of another substance which is itself liquid, and this process is termed the solution of the solid substance, cum the term thaw differs from to melt in being only applicable to substances whose ordinary condition is that of a liquid, and which have become solid in consequence of the abstraction of heat, and therefore return to the liquid condition of themselves.' Chamber's Journal.

SYN. To liquefy, dissolve, fuse, thaw, mollify, soften, subdue.

Melt (melt), v. i. 1. To become liquid; to dissolve; to be changed from a fixed or solid to a flowing state.

And whiter snow in minutes melts away. Dryden.

Melvie (mel'vi), v. t. To soil with meal. [Scotch.]

Sma' need has he to say a grace,
Or melvie his brow claithing. Burns.

Melyridæ (me-lī'rī-dē), n. pl. A group of small coleopterous insects, family Malacodermata, mostly British; type genus Melyris. The body is ovate, soft, and but slightly convex, and generally of a brilliant colour, red and green prevailing. They and their larvæ are found on flowers, which they frequent to feed on the smaller insects they find on them.

Melyris (me-lī'ris), n. [Gr. melouris, an insect mentioned by Nicander, and not identified.] A genus of coleopterous insects, belonging to the section Pentamera, and included in the Malacodermata. These insects are ordinarily found upon flowers; they are generally of small size and very gaily coloured. Most of the species are natives of Africa.

Mem. A contraction of Memorandum, placed before a note to aid the memory.

Mem. To remember to forget to ask

Old Whibread to my house one day.

Mem. Not to forget to take of beer the cask,

The brewer offered me away. Dr. Wolcot.

Member (mem'bér), n. [L. membrum, a limb, a member of the body.] 1. A part of an animal body capable of performing a distinct office; a vital organ; a limb.—2. Part of an aggregate or a whole; specifically, (a) a part of a discourse, or of a period or sentence; a clause; a part of a verse. (b) In arch. any subordinate part of a building, order, or composition, as a frieze, cornice, or moulding. (c) One of the persons composing a society, community, or the like; an individual forming part of an association; as, every citizen is a member of the state or body politic. (d) In alg. either of the two parts or sides of an equation united by the sign of equality (=).

Membered (mem'bér-d), a. 1. Having limbs: used chiefly in composition; as big-membered.—2. In her. a term used of a bird when its legs are borne of a different tincture to the bird itself.

Membership (mem'bér-ship), n. 1. The state of being a member.

External church membership or profession of the true religion. South.

2. The members of a body regarded collectively; community; society; as, the whole membership of the church.

Membracidae (mem-brá'si-dē), n. pl. [Gr. membrax, a kind of cicada.] The tree-hoppers, a family of homopterous insects, in many respects resembling the Cicadidae, but possessing the faculty of leaping, some of them to the distance of 5 or 6 feet. Some of them are found on the limbs of trees, and others on the stems of plants. This is an extensive family of insects, of the most bizarre forms. They abound in South America.

Membrane (mem'brán), n. [L. membrana, a thin skin, parchment, from membrum, a limb.] In anat. a texture of the animal body, arranged in the form of laminae, which covers organs, lines the interior of cavities, or takes part in the formation of the walls of canals or tubes. The term is also often applied to the thin expanded parts, of various texture, both in animals and vegetables. Membrane is generally divided into three kinds, mucous, serous, and fibrous. The lining of the nose, trachea, œsophagus, stomach, intestines, is of the first kind; the serous membranes form the lining of the sacs or closed cavities, as of the chest, abdomen, &c.; the fibrous membranes are tough, inelastic, and tendinous; such as the dura mater, the pericardium, the capsules of joints, &c.—Investing membrane, the first layer of cells which assumes a distinctly membranous form upon the surface of the cicatricle of the ovum. It was formerly called the serous layer of the germinal membrane.—Schneiderian membrane, the lining membrane of the upper part of the nose, in which the nerves of the sense of smell are supposed to terminate.

Membraneous, Membranaceous (mem-brá'nē-us, mem-brá-ná'shus), a. 1. Belonging to or resembling a membrane; consisting of membranes; as, a membraneous covering.

Birds of prey have membraneous stomachs, not muscular. Arbutnot.

2. In bot. thin, like membrane, and translucent. In general it denotes a flattened leaf or one resembling parchment.

Membraniferous (mem-brá-nif'ér-us), a. [L. membrana, a membrane, and fero, to bear.] Having or producing membranes.

Membraniform (mem-brán-i'f-orm), a. [L. membrana, a membrane, and forma, form.] Having the form of a membrane or of parchment.

Membranology (mem-brá-nol'o-jí), n. [L. membrana, a membrane, and Gr. logos, discourse.] The science which relates to membranes. [Rare.]

Membranous (mem-brán-us), a. Belonging to a membrane; consisting of membranes; resembling a membrane; as, membranous covering; membranous tissue.—Membranous cellular tissue, in bot. that kind of tissue in which the walls of the cells are composed solely of membrane. It may be considered as the basis of the vegetable structure, never being absent in plants, while many are entirely composed of it. Written also Membraneous, Membranaceous.

Memento (mô-men'tô), n. [L., remember, be mindful, 2d pers. sing. imper. of memini, to remember.] A hint, suggestion, notice, or memorial to awaken memory; that which reminds.

He is but a man, and seasonable mementos may be useful. Bacon.

Memoir (mem'oir, mem'war), n. [Fr. mémoire, from L. memoria, memory, from memor, mindful. See MEMORY.] 1. A notice of something remembered; an account of transactions or events written familiarly, or as they are remembered by the narrator; an account of matters connected with some period of history, but less thorough and formal than a history proper.—2. Or memorize another Golgotha. Shak.

They neglect to memorize their conquest of the Indians. Spenser.

2. To commit to memory; to learn by heart. Goodrich.

Memory (mem'or-i), n. [L. memoria, memory, from memor, mindful, from memini, to remember.] 1. The power or the capacity of having what was once present to the senses or the understanding suggested again to the mind, accompanied by a distinct consciousness that it has formerly been present to it; the faculty of the mind by which it retains the knowledge of past events, or ideas which are past; remembrance; recollection. The word memory is not employed uniformly in the same precise sense, but it always expresses some modification of that faculty which enables us to treasure up and preserve for future use the knowledge which we acquire; a faculty which is obviously the great foundation of all intellectual improvement. The word memory is sometimes used to express a capacity of retaining knowledge, and sometimes a power of recalling it to our thoughts when we have occasion to apply it to use. The latter operation of the mind, however, is more properly called recollection.—2. The act of remembering.

Some little memory of me will stir him. Shak.

3. The state of being remembered; exemption from oblivion; continued existence in the recollection of men; that which is remembered about a person or event. 'And left their memories a world's curse.' Tennyson.

The memory of the just is blessed. Prov. x. 7.

4. Anything remembered. 'Put strange memories in my head.' Tennyson.—5. The time within which past events can be remembered or recollected, or the time within which a person may have knowledge of what is past; as, the revolution in France was within the author's memory.—6. Memorial; monumental record; that which calls to remembrance.

Be better suited;

These weeds are memories of those worse hours.
I pry thee put them off.

Shak.

7. † An act or ceremony in remembrance; a service for the dead.

Their Diriges, their Trentals, and their shrifts.

Their memories, their singings, and their gifts.

Spenser.

—Memory, Recollection, Remembrance, Reminiscence. Memory is the faculty or capacity itself; recollection and remembrance are exercises of the faculty, while reminiscence is the thing remembered. Recollection [L. re, again, and colligo, collectum, to gather, to collect] differs from remembrance in implying more effort. To remember is to keep in mind, and things thus laid up in memory come to our remembrance without voluntary or conscious effort, but we strive to recollect things or thoughts past and partially forgotten. Recollection, like reminiscence, is sometimes used in the sense of that which is recollected; as, recollections of the Arabian Nights; but it differs from it in that its object is more complex, not one scene or event, but a connected series. Recollection in this sense, as well as reminiscence, being more concrete than the allied words, are frequently used in the plural. Reminiscence is scarcely used in reference to past thoughts, being commonly used in reference to past events; while recollection is peculiarly appropriate for the act of recalling mental operations. We narrate a reminiscence of our youth; we recollect the steps in a long mathematical operation; we remember a psalm or air laid up in memory.

Memphian (mem'f-an), a. [From Memphis, the ancient metropolis of Egypt.] 1. Pertaining to Memphis; Egyptian. 'Busiris and his Memphian chivalry.' Milton.—2. Very dark; a sense borrowed from the preternatural darkness brought over Egypt by Moses.

[Fr. menacer, It. minacciare, from L. minacio, threats, from minax, threatening, mina, a threat, from root min, seen in mineo, to project.] 1. To threaten; to express or show a disposition or determination to inflict punishment or other evil on; usually followed by with, before the evil threatened; as, the spirit of insubordination menaced Spain with the horrors of civil war.

My master fearfully did menace me with death.

Shak.

The man presents himself to their thoughts, but to menace and alarm them.

Burke.

2. To hold out threats of; to indicate the danger or risk of; as, a hanging rock menaces a fall. 'He menaced revenge upon the cardinal.' Shak.

Menace (men'as), n. [Fr. menace, L. minacio. See the verb.] A threat or threatening; the declaration or indication of a disposition or determination to inflict an evil; the indication of a probable evil or catastrophe to come.

Though he and his accursed crew
Fierce sign of battle make and menace high. Milton.
The Trojans view the dusty cloud from far,
And the dark menace of the distant war. Dryden.

Menacer (men'as-er), n. One who menaces or threatens.

Menachanite, Menaccanite (mē-nak'an-it), n. Titaniferous iron ore, a hematite in which part of the iron is replaced by titanium; a mineral of a grayish or iron black colour, occurring in very small rounded grains, imperfectly lamellar, and of a glistening lustre; found near Menachan, in Cornwall, England.

Menandrian (me-nan'dri-an), n. One of a sect of heretics, a disciple of Menander, who to the heresies of Simon Magus added some of his own, maintaining that no one could be saved except those baptized in his name, and that all thus baptized were immortal and incorruptible.

Mend (mend), v. t. [A shorter form of amend, from L. emendo, to free from fault—a for e or ex, out of, and menda, a blemish, a fault.] 1. To repair, as something broken, rent, defaced, decayed, or the like; to restore to the original condition; to restore to a sound or prosperous state; to put into shape or order again; to patch up; as, to mend a road; to mend a chair or table; to mend a garment; to mend a shoe; to mend a broken constitution.—2. To alter for the better; to improve; to ameliorate; to correct; to rectify; as, to mend one's manners.

In others' works thou dost but mend the style.

Shak.

3. To help; to advance; to further; to improve.

Though in some lands the grass is but short, yet it mends garden herbs and fruits. Mortimer.

This word was formerly used with much greater latitude than it is now. Shakspeare uses it in the sense of to make up for any defect in any way, and has such uses as the following.—4. To add to; to increase.

Over and above Signior Baptista's liberality I'll mend it with a largess.

[This meaning still survives in one or two phrases, such as to mend one's pace; to mend one's efforts.]—5. † To increase the value of in any way, directly or indirectly.

You mend the jewel by the wearing it.

6. † To adjust.

Menura (me-nū'ra), n. [Gr. menē, the moon, and oura, a tail.] A singular genus of birds inhabiting New South Wales, and forming the inessential family Menuridae. The only species known is the lyre-bird (M. superba or paradisæa). Its size is a little less than that of a common pheasant. The tail of the male is remarkable for the three sorts of feathers that compose it, and notwithstanding the sombre hues of this bird, the magnificence and peculiar structure of the tail, which resembles the form of an ancient Grecian lyre, give it a superb appearance. It has a pleasing song, and is said to be capable of imitating the voices of other birds.

Menuridæ (me-nū'ri-dē), n. pl. A family of inessorial birds, of which the lyre-bird (M. superba) is the type.

Menyanthes (men-i-an'thēz), n. [Gr. mēn, a month, and anthos, a flower—in allusion to the duration of the flowers.] A plant, nat. order Gentianaceæ, possessing powerful tonic properties. M. trifoliata, the only species, occurs in Britain and throughout the southern hemisphere. It is known by the names of bog-bean, buck-bean, and water-trefoil. It has densely creeping and matted root-stocks, with long-stalked trifoliate leaves, and a long-stalked raceme of beautifully fringed pinkish-white flowers. It is bitter, tonic, and febrifugal. It contains an extractive called menyanthine, which forms a white, transparent, and when thoroughly dried, pulverizable mass of an intense degree of bitterness. An infusion of the leaves is prescribed in rheumatism and dropsies; they have been also used as a substitute for hops in making beer.

Menyanthine (men-i-an'thin), n. A non-azotized compound obtained from Menyanthes trifoliata. See MENYANTHES.

Menye, Menyie, Menzie (mēn'f), n. Same as Meiny.

Menziesia (men-zī-ē'zhi-a), n. [In honour of Archibald Menzies, surgeon and naturalist to the expedition under Vancouver.] A genus of North American and Japanese shrubs, belonging to the nat. order Ericaceæ. They have alternate leaves, and white, greenish, or purple, sometimes rather large, nodding flowers in terminal fascicles or corymbs. The Irish heath (Daboecia polyfolia) was at one time referred to this genus.

cury. See MERCURIC.—Mercurous chloride, calomel.

Mercury (mër-kü'-ri), n. [L. Mercurius, from root of merces, wages.] 1. In myth. the name of a Roman divinity, identified in later times with the Greek Hermès. As representing Hermès he was regarded as the son of Jupiter and Maia, and was looked upon as the god of eloquence, of commerce, and of robbers. He was also the messenger, herald, and ambassador of Jupiter. As a Roman divinity he was merely the patron of commerce and gain.—2. Sym. Hg.; at. wt. 200. Quicksilver, a metal whose specific gravity is greater than that of any other metal, except the platinum metals, gold, and tungsten, being 13.56, or thirteen times and a half heavier than water. It is the only metal which is liquid at common temperatures. It freezes at a temperature of 39° or 40° below the zero of Fahrenheit, that is, at a temperature of 71° or 72° below the freezing-point of water. Under a heat of 660° it rises in fumes and is gradually converted into a red oxide. Mercury is used in barometers to ascertain the weight of the atmosphere, and in thermometers to determine the temperature of the air, for which purpose it is well adapted by its expansibility, and the extensive range between its freezing and boiling points. Preparations of this metal are among the most powerful poisons, and are extensively used as medicines. The preparation called calomel or mercurous chloride ($HgCl$) is a most efficacious deobstruent. Another valuable preparation is corrosive sublimate or mercuric chloride ($HgCl_2$). From the fluid state in which mercury exists it readily combines with most of the metals, to which, if in sufficient quantity, it imparts a degree of fusibility or softness: these compounds are termed amalgams. (See AMALGAM.) Mercury is chiefly found in the state of sulphide, but it is also found native. The chief mines of mercury are in Spain, but it is also found in Germany, Italy, China, and Peru.—Native or virgin mercury, the pure metal found in the form of globules in cavities of the ores of this metal.—Cornueous mercury, the protochloride of mercury. Called also Horn-mercury and Mercurial Horn-ore.—3. In med. any preparation of mercury used as a remedy.—4.† Warmth or liveliness of temperament; spirit; sprightly qualities; hence, liability to change; fickleness.

He was so full of mercury that he could not fix long in any friendship, or to any design. Bp. Burnet.

5. A genus of plants, Mercuriales (which see); in America, applied to several climbing plants, most frequently to the Rhus toxicodendron or poison ivy.—6. In astron. the planet that revolves round the sun within the orbit of the planet Venus and next to it. It is visible to the naked eye in the evening when it is to the east of the sun, but only when near its greatest distance or elongation from the sun. Similarly, it is visible in the morning before sunrise, only when near its greatest elongation westward of the sun. Its apparent diameter varies from 5 to 12 seconds; the real diameter is about 8140 miles. Its bulk is to that of the earth as 63 to 1000. It revolves on an axis (the inclination of which to the ecliptic is not determined) in 24 hours 5 minutes 28.3 seconds. The mean sidereal revolution is performed in 87.969258 mean solar days. It has seven times the light and heat of the earth. Mean distance from the sun 38,000,000 miles. 7. A common name for a newspaper or periodical publication; hence, sometimes a newspaper carrier or a seller of newspapers.

Those who sell them (news-books) by wholesale from the press are called mercuries. Cowell.

8. A messenger; an intelligencer.

We give the winds wings, and the angels too; as being the swift messengers of God, the nimble mercuries of heaven. Abp. Sancroft.

Mercury+ (mër-kü'-ri), v. t. To wash with a preparation of mercury.

Mercury Goose-foot (mër-kü'-ri gös-füt), n. One of the common names given to Chenopodium Bonus-Henricus. See CHENOPODIUM.

Mercy (mër'si), n. [Fr. merci, It. mercé, from L. merces, mercedis, hire, pay, recompense, in L.L. mercy, from stem of mereo, to deserve.] 1. That benevolence, mildness, or tenderness of heart which disposes a person to overlook injuries or to treat an offender better than he deserves; the disposition that tempers justice and induces an injured person to forgive trespasses and injuries, and to forbear punishment or inflict less than law or justice will warrant. In this sense there is perhaps no word in our language precisely synonymous with mercy. It implies benevolence, tenderness, mildness, pity or compassion, and clemency, but exercised only toward offenders. Mercy is a distinguishing attribute of the Supreme Being.

The Lord is long-suffering and of great mercy, forgiving iniquity and transgression, and by no means clearing the guilty. Num. xiv. 18.

The quality of mercy is not strained;
It droppeth, as the gentle rain from heaven,
Upon the place beneath. It is twice blessed:
It blesteth him that gives and him that takes. Shak.

2. An act or exercise of mercy or favour; a kindness proceeding from Providence; blessing; as, it is a mercy that they escaped.

I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies . . . which thou hast shewed unto thy servant. Gen. xxxii. 10.

3. Pity; compassion manifested toward a person in distress.

And he said, He that shewed mercy on him.

4. Discretion; unrestrained exercise of will or authority; often in the phrase at one's mercy, that is, completely in one's power.

And the offender's life lies in the mercy Of the duke only. Shak.

Thy cruelty . . . hath . . . left thee to the mercy of the law. Shak.

A lover is ever complaining of cruelty while anything is denied him; and when the lady ceases to be cruel, she is, from the next moment, at his mercy. Swift.

—To cry mercy, to beg pardon.

I cry thy mercy with all my heart. Dryden.

—Sisters of Mercy, the name given to members of female religious communities founded for the purpose of nursing the sick at their own homes, visiting prisoners, especially persons condemned to death, attending lying-in hospitals, superintending the education of females, protecting women out of employment, and the performance of similar works of charity and mercy. In connection with the Roman Catholic Church, an order of these sisters was founded at Seez, in the Sardinian States, by P. Bazin, vicar-general of the diocese, in 1823—hence called the order of Seez; and another was shortly after founded in Dublin by Mother Catherine M'Auley. Communities of Sisters of Mercy are now widely distributed over Europe and America, some of them being connected with the Church of England.

Mercy-seat (mër'si-sét), n. The place of mercy or forgiveness; the propitiatory; the covering of the ark of the covenant among the Jews. This was of gold, and its ends were fixed to two cherubs, whose wings extended forward and formed a kind of throne for the majesty of God, who is represented in Scripture as sitting between the cherubs. It was from this seat that God gave his oracles to Moses, or to the high-priest who consulted him.

Mercy-stroke (mër'si-strök), n. The death-blow, as putting an end to pain.

Merdy (mër'di), n. [Fr. merde, L. merda, dung.] Ordure; dung. B. Jonson.

Mere (mër), a. [Superl. merest; the comparative is seldom if ever used.] [O. Fr. mier, L. merus, alone, nothing but, pure, unmixed.] 1. Apart from anything more; this or that only; this or that and nothing else; such and no more; simple.

From mere success nothing can be concluded in favour of a nation.

What if the head, the eye, or ear repudiate? To serve mere engines to the ruling mind? Pope.

2. Absolute; entire; in every respect; as, a piece of the merest folly. 'Engaged my friend to his mere enemy.' Shak.—3.† Unmixed; pure; genuine. 'Wine . . . mere and unmixed.' Jer. Taylor.

With them all the people of Mounster went out, and many other of which were mere English thenceforth joined themselves with the Irish against the king.

—Mere right, in law, the right of property without possession.

Mere (mēr), n. [A. Sax. mere, mære, a pool, mere, or lake, the sea; Goth. mare, D. meer, meir, Icel. marr, G. meer, the sea, a lake; allied to moor, marsh, moorass, and L. mare, the sea. This word is the same as the mer in mermaid.] A pool or lake.

And fling me deep in that forgotten mere. Tennyson.

Mere (mēr), n. [A. Sax. mære, gemære, O. D. meer, a boundary; Icel. merr, border-land.] A boundary; a boundary-stone; a mere-stone. Also written Mear, Meer. [Obsolete or provincial.]

The Trojan Brute did first that citie fownd, And Hygate made the mere thereof by west.

To guide my course aright What mound or steady mere is offered to my sight.

Mere† (mēr), v. t. To divide, limit, or bound. Merogutte (mār-gūt), n. [Fr. mere-goutte, from L. merus, pure, unmixed, and gutta, Fr. goutte, a drop.] The first running of wine, oil, &c., before any pressure has been used. Holland.

Merely (mēr'li), adv. 1. Purely; only; solely; simply; thus and no other way; for this and no other purpose.

Prize not your life for other ends Than merely to oblige your friends. Swift.

2.† Entirely; absolutely; wholly; utterly; completely. 'Things rank and gross in nature possess it merely.' Shak.

I am as happy In my friend's good, as if 'twere merely mine.

Merenchyma (mē-ren'ki-ma), n. [Gr. meros, a part, and enchyma, that which is poured in.] In bot. spherical cellular tissue.

Merestman (mēr'st-man), n. See MEARSMAN.

Merestead (mēr'stād), n. [Mere, a boundary, and stead, a place.] The land within the mere or boundary of a farm; a farm.

The men were intent on their labours, Busy with heaving and building, with garden plot and with merestead.

Merestone (mēr'stōn), n. A stone to mark a boundary.

Meretricious (mēr-ē-tri'shūs), a. [L. meretricius, from meretrix, meretrix, a prostitute, from mero, to earn.] 1. Pertaining to prostitutes; such as is practised by harlots; libidinous.

The meretricious world claps our cheeks, and fondles us unto failings.

Meridian (me-ri'di-an), a. [L. meridianus, from meridies, for mediæ, mid-day—medius, middle, and dies, day. Varro testifies that the word was originally mediæ, and that he had seen it so written on a sun-dial.] 1. Pertaining to mid-day or the meridian; that is the imaginary line in the heavens which the sun crosses at mid-day; noon-day; as, the meridian sun; the sun's meridian heat or splendour.

Towards heaven and the full-blazing sun, Which now sat high in his meridian tower.

2. Pertaining to the culmination or highest point, the sun being highest at mid-day; pertaining to a period of greatest splendour; as, the hero enjoyed his meridian glory.—3. Pertaining to the magnetic meridian.—4. A term applied to the eighth of Professor H. Roger's fifteen divisions of the palæozoic strata in the Appalachian chain of North America, the names of which suggest metaphorically the different natural periods of the day; it corresponds to a certain extent with our lowermost Devonians.—Meridian line, an arc or part of the meridian of a place, terminated each way by the horizon.—Meridian altitude of the sun or stars, their altitude when on the meridian of the place where they are observed.—Meridian line on a dial, the same as the twelve o'clock hour-line.

Meridian (me-ri'di-an), n. [See the adjective.] 1. Mid-day; noon.—2. The highest point; the culmination; the point of greatest splendour; as, the meridian of life; the meridian of power. 'In the meridian of Edward's age and vigour.' Hallam.

I have touched the highest point of all my greatness, And, from that full meridian of my glory, I haste now to my setting.

3. In geog. an imaginary circle on the surface of the earth passing through both poles, and through any other given place, the plane of it thus dividing the globe into two hemispheres. Every place on the globe has its meridian, and when the sun arrives above this circle it is mid-day or noon, whence the name. Longitude is measured between the meridians. (See LONGITUDE).—4. In astron. a similar imaginary circle of the celestial sphere, passing through the poles of the heavens and the zenith of any place; often called a celestial meridian. When the sun is on the meridian corresponding to any place on the earth it is noon at that place.—5. Special circumstances, conditions, capabilities or requirements, as of a country, district, sphere of life, &c.; thus, a book, a custom, may be adapted to the meridian of France or Italy, but not to that of England.

All other knowledge merely serves the concerns of this life, and is fitted to the meridian thereof.

6. A dram of spirits taken at mid-day. [Scotch.]

The ancient Scottish custom of a meridian, as it was called, or noontide dram of spirits.

—First meridian, that from which all the others are reckoned, counting eastward and westward, and from which longitudes are reckoned. See LONGITUDE.—Meridian of a globe, the brazen circle in which it turns, and by which it is supported. Meridian lines are also traced on the globe itself, usually at 15° distance.—Magnetic meridian, one of the great circles which pass through the assumed magnetic poles, in a manner similar to that in which the common meridians pass through the poles of the earth.

Mesitule, Mesityl (mē'si-tūl, mē'si-til), n. A supposed organic radical, of which acetone is a hydrate of the oxide.

Mesitylene (mē'si-tīl-ēn), n. (C₆H₁₂.) An oily, colourless liquid, obtained from acetone distilled with half its volume of fuming sulphuric acid.

Meslin, Maslin (mez'lin, maz'lin), n. [Written in various other ways, as mestlin, mastlin, Sc. mashlum, maslin, probably directly from O. Fr. mestillon, mestelon, from L. mestilio, mixed grain (Fr. méteil), from L. mixtum, mixed; or from O. Fr. mesler, to mix, from the same stem, viz. L. miscere, to mix. See MÊLÉE.] A mixture of different sorts of grain, as of wheat and rye.

Mesmerer (mez-mēr-ē), n. The person on whom a mesmerist operates; one who is mesmerized.

Mesmeric, Mesmerical (mez-mēr'ik, mez-mēr'ik-al), a. Pertaining to or produced by mesmerism; as, mesmeric sleep.

Mesmerism (mez'mér-izm), n. [After Frederic Anthony Mesmer, a German physician, who propounded the doctrine in 1773.] 1. The doctrine that one person can exercise influence over the will and nervous system of another, and produce certain phenomena by virtue of a supposed emanation, called animal magnetism, proceeding from him, or simply by the domination of his will over that of the person operated on. Originally Mesmer professed to produce his results by the operation of actual magnets, but all such apparatus has long been abandoned, and those who profess belief in magnetism as the cause of the phenomena exhibited refer it to the body of the mesmerist. Six stages or degrees of mesmerism have been enumerated, viz. the walking stage, the stage of half-sleep, mesmeric sleep or stupor, somnambulism, self-contemplation or clairvoyance, universal illumination, in which the patient knows what is going on in distant regions, all that has happened or will happen to those persons with whom he is brought into mesmeric relation, observes their internal organization, prescribes for them, reads sealed letters, and so forth.—2. The influence itself; animal magnetism.

Mesmerist (mez'mér-ist), n. One who practises or believes in mesmerism.

Mesmerization (mez'mér-iz-ā'shon), n. The act of mesmerizing, or state of being mesmerized.

Mesmerize (mez'mér-iz), v. t. pret. & pp. mesmerized; ppr. mesmerizing. To communicate mesmerism to; to bring into a state of mesmeric sleep.

Mesmerizer (mez'mér-iz-ér), n. One who mesmerizes.

Mesnalty (mē-nāl'i-ti), n. [See MESNE.] A manor held under a superior lord.

Mesnalty (mē-nāl-ti), n. The right of the mesne. Cowell.

Mesne (mēn), a. [Norm. mesne, middle, from L. mediānus, middle; comp. It. mezzano, middle. See MEAN, a. middle.] In law, middle; intervening; as, a mesne lord, that is, a lord who holds land of a superior but grants a part of it to another person. In this case he is a tenant to the superior, but lord or superior to the second grantee, and called the mesne lord.—Mesne process, that part of the proceedings in a suit which intervenes between the original process or writ and the final issue, and which issues, pending the suit, on some collateral matter; and sometimes it is understood to be the whole process preceding the execution.—Mesne profits, the profits of an estate which accrue to a tenant in possession after the demise of the lessor.—Action of mesne profits, an action of trespass which is brought to recover profits derived from land whilst the possession of it has been improperly withheld—that is, the yearly value of the premises. It is brought after a judgment for the plaintiff in an action of ejectment which recovered possession of the land.

Mesoblast (mes'o-blast), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and blastos, a bud.] In physiol. the layer which arises between the epiblast and hypoblast, the two primary layers of the embryo. It answers to the old phrase, vascular layer between the serous and mucous layers.

Mesocæcum (mes'o-sē-kum), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and L. cæcum (which see).] That part of the peritoneum which embraces the cæcum and its appendages.

Mesocarp (mes'o-kārp), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and karpos, fruit.] In bot. the middle part or layer of the pericarp. It is the layer immediately under the epicarp, or outermost covering of the pericarp. It forms the pulpy part of the cherry, peach, &c., and is also green and succulent in the pea until it has attained maturity, when it dries up. It is also termed sarcocarp, especially when thick and fleshy.

Mesochilium (mes-o-kī'lī-um), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and cheilos, a lip.] In bot. the middle portion of the labellum of an orchid.

Mesocolon (mes'o-kō-lon), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and E. colon (which see).] In anat. that part of the mesentery, which, having reached the extremity of the ileum, contracts, or that part of the mesentery to which the colon is attached. See COLON.

Mesoderm (mes'o-dérn), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and derma, the skin, shell.] 1. In zool. the middle layer of tissue lying between the ectoderm and the endoderm of some of the Cœlenterata. It represents the structures which lie between the epidermis and the

ch, chain; ch, Sc. loch; g, go; j, job;

ñ, Fr. ton; ng, sing; th, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

epithelium in more complex animals.—2. In bot. the middle layer of tissue in the shell of the spore-case of an urn-moss.

Mesogastric (mes-o-gas'trik), a. [Gr. mesos, middle, and gaster, the belly.] In anat. of or belonging to the middle of the belly; specifically, a term applied to the membrane which sustains the stomach, and by which it is attached to the abdomen.

Mesogastrium (mes-o-gas'tri-um), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and gaster, the belly.] In anat. the umbilical region of the abdomen.

Mesolabe (mes-o-läb), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and lambano, to take.] An instrument employed by the ancients for finding two mean proportionals between two given lines, which were required in the problem of the duplication of the cube.

Mesole (mé'söl), n. A zeolite found in Sweden and the Faroe Islands. Its colour is white, grayish, or yellowish-white; it occurs massive, and globular, or reniform. It is composed of silica, alumina, soda, lime, and water. Called also Thomsonite.

Mesoleucos (mes-o-lu'kos), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and leukos, white.] A precious stone with a streak of white in the middle.

Mesolite (mes-o-lit), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and lithos, a stone.] See MESOTYPE.

Mesolobar (mes-o-lö'bar), a. In anat. of or belonging to the mesolobe; as, mesolobar arteries.

Mesolobe (mes-o-löb), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and lobos, a lobe.] In anat. the corpus callosum. See CORPUS.

Mesologarithm (mes-o-log'a-rithm), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and E. logarithm.] A logarithm of the co-sine or co-tangent.

Mesomelas (me-som'e-las), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and melas, black.] A precious stone with a black vein parting every colour in the midst.

Mesophloeum (mes-o-flö'um), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and phloios, bark.] In bot. the middle cellular layer of the bark. It underlies the epiphloeum and overlies the liber.

Mesophyllum (mes-o-flil'um or me-sof'il-um), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and phyllon, a leaf.] In bot. the parenchymatous tissue forming the fleshy part of a leaf between the upper and lower integuments.

Mesoplast (mes'o-plast), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and plassō, to mould.] In physiol. the soft or gelatinous matter occupying a cell and constituting the nucleus.

Mesopodium (mes-o-pö'di-um), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and pous, podos, a foot.] In zool. the middle portion of the foot of molluscs.

Mesorectum (mes-o-rek'tum), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and E. rectum (which see).] In anat. that part of the peritoneum which connects the rectum with the front of the sacrum.

Mesosperm (mes'o-spër'm), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and sperma, seed.] In bot. a membrane of a seed: the secundine, or second membrane from the surface.

Mesothesis (me-soth'e-sis), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and thesis (which see).] Middle place; mean. 'Imitation is the mesothesis of likeness and difference.' Coleridge.

Mesothorax (mes-o-thö'raks), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and thorax, the chest.] In entom. the middle ring of the thorax.

Mesotype (mes'ö-tip), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and typos, form, type.] In mineral. a zeolitic mineral, occurring in slender crystals, and delicate, radiated concretions, and consisting of the hydrated silicate either of alumina and soda, in which case it is called also soda mesotype or natrolite, or of alumina and lime, when it is called lime mesotype or scölecite, or of alumina and both lime and soda, in which case it is called mesolite.

Mesoxalic (mes-oks-al'ik), a. [Gr. mesos, middle, and oxalic (which see).] Of or pertaining to, or derived from alloxan; as, mesoxalic acid (C₄H₂O₆).

Mesozoic (mes-o-zö'ik), a. [Gr. mesos, middle, and zōē, life.] In geol. pertaining or relating to the secondary age, or the era between the palæozoic and cainozoic. See CAINOZOIC.

Mespilus (mes'pi-lus), n. [L., a medlar.] A genus of trees now combined with Pyrus, from which it differs in the bony structure of the endocarp, belonging to the pomaceous division of the nat. order Rosaceæ. M. germanica is the common medlar. See MEDLAR.

Mespriset (mes'priz), n. [O. Fr. mespris, Fr. mépris, from mespriser, to despise. See MISPRIZE.] Contempt, scorn.

Then, if all failye, we will by force it win,
And eke reward the wretch for his mespris.
Spenser.

Mess (mes), n. [O. Fr. mes, a service of meat, a course of dishes at table, Fr. metts (the t being erroneously inserted); It. mess, a course at table, properly that which is sent, from L. missus, pp. of mittere, to send. Some refer the word to O. H. G. maz, Goth. mats, meat, but this seems less probable. As to sense 5, see also MASH, n.] 1. A dish or a quantity of food prepared or set on a table at one time; food prepared for a person or party at one meal; as, a mess of pottage.

And he took and sent messes unto them before him; but Benjamin's mess was five times as much as any of theirs. Gen. xliii. 34.

2. As much provender as is given to a beast at once.—3. A number of persons who eat together at the same table, and the entertainment provided for them; especially a company of officers in the army or navy, who eat together.

Uncut up pies at the nether end filled
With moss and stones, partly to make a show with
And partly to keep the lower mess from eating.
Shak. & F.

4. Hence, as at great feasts the company were arranged in fours, called messes (in the Inns of Court a mess still consists of four), the word came to mean a set of four generally. 'Where are your mess of sons?' Shak.

There lacks a fourth thing to make up the mess.
Laubmo.

You three fools lacked me fool to make up the mess.
Shak.

5. A disorderly mixture; things jumbled together; a state of dirt and disorder; something dirty; as, the house was in a mess; to make a mess of one's clothes. [Colloq.]—6. Fig. a situation of confusion or embarrassment, distress or difficulty; a muddle.

Neither battle I see, nor arraying, nor king in Israel,
Only infinite jumble and mess and dislocation.
Crough.

Mess (mes), v. i. To take meals in common with others as one of a mess; particularly said of naval and military men; to associate at the same table; to eat in company; hence, to eat or feed in general.

Now that we are in harbour I mess here, because Mrs. Trotter is on board. Marryat.

Mess (mes), v. t. 1. To supply with a mess. 2. To make a mess of; to soil or dirty. 'I've *mess*ed them (trowsers).' W. Collins. [Colloq.]

Mess, Messe (mes), n. The Roman Catholic service of the mass. [Old English and Scotch.]

Message (mes'sä), n. [Fr.; It. messaggio, L.L. missaticum, message, from L. mittere, to send.] 1. Any notice or communication, written or verbal, sent from one person to another.

The welcome message made, was soon received.
Dryden.

Specifically.—2. An official address or communication, not made in person but delivered by a messenger, as an official written communication of facts or opinions sent by a chief magistrate to the houses of a legislature or other deliberative body, or from one house of legislature to another.

Message,† n. A messenger. Chaucer.

Message,† n. A messenger. Gower.

Messalian (mes-sä-li-an), n. One of a sect of heretics of the fourth century who professed to adhere to the strict letter of the gospel, specifically refusing to work, and quoting this passage: 'Labour not for the food that perisheth.'

Messan, Messin (mes'san, mes'sin), n. [Jamieson conjectures that it may be from Fr. maison, a house, but this is very doubtful. It must be connected with messet (which see), and probably means a dog of mixed race, ultimately from L. misceo, to mix.] A dog of no breeding; a mongrel; a cur. [Scotch.]

But wad hae spent an hour caressin',
E'en wi' a tinkler-gypsy's messin. Burns.

Mess-deck (mes'dek), n. The deck on which a ship's crew mess.

Messenger (mes'sen-jër), n. [O. E. messenger; Fr. messenger. (See MESSAGE.)] The n has intruded as in passenger.] 1. One who bears a message or goes on an errand; the bearer of a verbal or written communication, notice, or invitation from one person to another, or to a public body; one who conveys despatches from one prince or court to another.

Came running in, much like a man dismayed,
A messenger with letters. Spenser.

2. One who or that which foreshows; a harbinger; a forerunner.

Yon gray lines
That fret the clouds are messengers of day. Shak.

3. Naut. a large rope used to unmoor or heave up a ship's anchors, by transmitting the power of the capstan to the cable.—4. In law, a person appointed to perform certain ministerial duties under bankrupt and insolvent laws, such as to take charge of the estate of the bankrupt or insolvent, and to transact certain other duties in reference to the proceedings in bankruptcy or insolvency.—Queen's (king's) messenger, an officer employed under the secretaries of state, kept in readiness to carry despatches both at home and abroad.—SYN. Carrier, intelligencer, courier, harbinger, forerunner, precursor, herald.

Messenger-at-arms (mes'sen-jër-at-armz), n. In Scots law, an officer appointed by and under the control of the Lyon-king-at-arms. He executes all summonses and letters of diligence connected with the Court of Session and Court of Justiciary.

Messet (mes'et), n. [See MESSAN.] A low-bred dog; a messan. Hall.

Messiah (mes-si'ad), n. A poem with the Messiah for its hero; specifically, a modern German epic poem written by Klopstock, relating to the sufferings and triumphs of the Messiah.

Messiah (mes-si'a), n. (Heb. māshiah, anointed, from māshach, to anoint.) Christ, the Anointed; the Saviour of the world.

At thy nativity a glorious choir
Of angels in the fields of Bethlehem sung
To shepherds watching at their folds by night,
And told them the Messiah now was born. Milton.

Messiahship (mes-si'a-ship), n. The character, state, or office of the Saviour. 'Joseph . . . whose prejudices were against the Messiahship and religion of Jesus.' Buckminster.

Messianic (mes-si-an'ik), a. Relating to the Messiah; as, messianic psalms.

Messias (mes-si'as), n. Same as Messiah.

Messidor (mes-si'dor), n. [Fr., from L. messis, harvest, and Gr. dōron, a gift.] The tenth month of the year in the calendar of the first French republic, commencing June 19th and ending July 18th.

Messieurs (mes'yërz), n. [Fr. pl. of Monsieur (which see).] Sirs; gentlemen; used in English as the plural of Mr., and generally contracted into Messrs.

Mess-mate (mes'mät), n. An associate in taking meals; one who eats ordinarily at the same table.

Mess-mates, hear a brother sailor
Sing the dangers of the sea. Stevens.

Messrs. An abbreviation of Messieurs.

Mess-table (mes'tä-bl), n. The table at which a mess dine together.

Message (mes'swä), n. [O. Fr. message, mesage; L.L. messagium, mansio, manationem, from L. mansio, mansio, a dwelling. See MANSION.] In law, a dwelling-house, with the adjacent buildings and curtilage, appropriated to the use of the household; a manor-house and its belongings. Tennyson.

Meste,† a. superl. [A. Sax. mæst, Sc. maist.] Most. Chaucer.

Mestee (mes'të), n. [See MESTIZO.] The offspring of a white and a quadroon. Written also Mustee. [West Indian.]

Mesteque (mes-tä'ke), n. The Mexican name for the finest kinds of the cochineal insect.

Mestizo, Mestino (mes-të-zö, mes-të-nö), n. [Sp. mestizo, O. Fr. mestis, Fr. métis, from L. mixtus, pp. of misceo, to mix.] The offspring of a Spaniard or Creole and an American Indian. [Spanish-American.]

Mestling (mes'ting), n. [See MESLIN.] Yellow metal; brass used for the church vessels and ornaments in the middle ages.

Mesymnicum (me-sim'ni-kum), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, and hymnos, a festive song.] In anc. poetry, a repetition at the end of a stanza.

Met (met), pret. & pp. of meet.

Meti (met), pret. & pp. of mete, to measure. Then Hector, Priam's martial son, stepped forth and met the ground. Chapman.

Met (met), n. [See METE.] A measure of any kind; a bushel; a barrel. [Scotch and provincial.]

Meta (met'a), [Gr. Etymologically the same as A. Sax. and O. E. mīd, G. mīd, Icel. and Goth. met, with.] A prefix in words of Greek origin, signifying beyond, over, after, with, between; and frequently denoting change or transformation.

Metabasis (me-tab'a-sis), n. [Gr., from meta, beyond, and bainō, to go.] 1. In rhet. a passing from one thing to another; transition.—2. In med. the same as Metabola.

Fäte, fär, fat, fäll; mé, met, hér; pine, pin; nôte, not, möve; tübe, tub, bull; oil, pound; ü, Sc. abune; ý, Sc. fey.

Metabola (me-tab'o-la), n. [Gr. metabolē, change, from meta, beyond, and bolē, a casting.] In med. a change of some sort, as of air, time, or disease. [Rare.]

Metabola (me-tab'o-la), n. pl. In entom. insects that undergo metamorphosis.

Metabolian (met-a-bō'lī-an), n. [Gr. metabolē, change.] In entom. an insect which undergoes a metamorphosis.

Metabolic (met-a-bol'ik), a. [See METABOLA.] Pertaining or relating to change; capable of changing or being changed; specifically, (a) in zool. a term applied to an insect which undergoes metamorphosis. (b) In physiol. a term applied to phenomena which result from chemical changes, either in the component particles of the cell itself, or in the surrounding protoplasm.

Metacarpal (met-a-kār'pal), a. Of or pertaining to the metacarpus. See HAND.

Metacarpus (met-a-kār'pus), n. [Gr. metakarpion—meta, beyond, and karpōs, the wrist.] In anat. the part of the hand between the wrist and the fingers.

Metacentre (met-a-sen'ter), n. [Gr. meta, beyond, and kentron, centre.] In physics, that point in a floating body in which, when the body is disturbed from the position of equilibrium, the vertical line passing through the centre of gravity of the fluid displaced (regarded as still filling the place occupied by the body) meets the line which, when the body is at rest, passes through the centre of gravity of the fluid and that of the body. In order that the body may float with stability the position of the metacentre must be above that of the centre of gravity.

Metacetone (me-tas'e-tōn), n. [Gr. meta, with, and E. acetone.] (C₆H₁₀O). A substance obtained by the dry distillation of a mixture of sugar, starch, gum, or mannite with finely powdered quicklime. It is a colourless liquid having a pleasant odour.

Metachronism (me-tak'rōn-izm), n. [Gr. meta, beyond, and chronos, time.] An error committed in chronology by placing an event after its real time.

Metacism (met'a-sizm), n. [L. metacismus, Gr. metakismos, a frequent repetition of the letter m.] A defect in pronouncing the letter m; a too frequent use or repetition of the letter m.

Metacresol (met'a-kre-sol), n. [Prefix meta, and cresol.] A modification of cresol.

Metagallate (met-a-gal'lat), n. [Prefix meta, and gallate.] A salt formed from metagallic acid and a base.

Metagallic (met-a-gal'ik), a. [Prefix meta, and gallic.] In chem. pertaining to or derived from gallic acid; as, metagallic acid.

Metage (mēt'āj), n. [From meto.] 1. Measurement of coal.—2. Charge for or price of measuring.

Metagelatin (met-a-jel'a-tin), n. [Prefix meta, and gelatine.] In photog. the name given to a substance used as a preservative in the collodion process, consisting of a strong solution of gelatine boiled and cooled several times till it ceases to gelatinize and remains fluid.

Metagenesis (met-a-jen'e-sis), n. [Gr. meta, beyond, after, change, and genesis, production, from root gen, to produce.] In zool. the changes of form which the representative of a species undergoes in passing by a series of successively generated individuals, from the egg to the perfect state; alternation of generation. The phenomena occur in their most striking form amongst the Hydrozoa, and the steps may be indicated, in a general way, thus: (1) There is an ovum or egg, free-swimming and impregnated. (2) This ovum attaches itself to a fixed submarine object, and develops into an organized animal. (3) This organism produces buds or zooids, often of two kinds—one set nutritive, the other generative—unlike each other and unlike their parent, the whole forming a hydroid colony. (4) The generative set mature eggs, which, on being liberated, become the free-swimming impregnated ova of No. 1, and the cycle is renewed. These steps are illustrated in Sertularia. The egg is a free-swimming ciliated body, which, on becoming fixed, develops a mouth and tentacles. This organism produces by continuous gemination two sets of buds, of which the generative set mature eggs, which become the free-swimming ciliated bodies with which the cycle began. In others, as Corynida, the generative buds become detached and exist as jelly-fish (medusoids), which produce eggs which develop, not into jelly-fish, but into the polypide or polypidom of the hydroid colony on which they were produced. In Lucernarida propagation takes place by means of fission. Metagenesis takes place amongst some of the Entozoa and Tunicata.

Metagenetic, Metagenic (met'a-je-net'ik, met-a-jen'ik), a. Pertaining to metagenesis, or the production of changes in a species after its first origin, as it goes on to a more perfect state. Owen.

Metagrammatism (met-a-gram'mat-izm), n. [Gr. meta, beyond, and gramma, a letter.] The transposition of the letters of a name into such a connection as to express some perfect sense applicable to the person named; anagrammatism.

Metal (met'al), n. [L. metallum, Gr. metallon, a mine, a metal.] 1. Elementary substances have been divided by chemists into two classes, metals and non-metals or metalloids, but these merge one into the other by gradations so imperceptible that it is impossible to frame a definition which will not either include some non-metallic bodies or exclude some metallic. A metal is usually supposed to be: An elementary opaque body or substance, having a peculiar lustre connected with its opacity called metallic; insoluble in water; solid, except in one instance, at ordinary temperatures; generally fusible by heat; a good conductor of heat and electricity; capable, when in the state of an oxide, of uniting with acids and forming salts; and having the property, when its compounds are submitted to electrolysis, of invariably appearing at the negative pole of the battery. Many of the metals are also malleable, or susceptible of being beaten or rolled out into sheets or leaves, and some of them are extremely ductile or capable of being drawn out into wires of great fineness. They are sometimes found native or pure, but more generally combined with oxygen, sulphur, and some other elements, constituting ores. The great difference in the malleability of the metals gave rise to the old distinction of metals and semi-metals, which is now disregarded. The following—fifty-one in number—are the elementary substances usually regarded as metals:—aluminium, antimony, arsenic, barium, bismuth, cadmium, caesium, calcium, cerium, chromium, cobalt, columbium or niobium, copper, didymium, erbium, gallium, glucinum, gold, indium, iridium, iron, lanthanum, lead, lithium, magnesium, manganese, mercury, molybdenum, nickel, osmium, palladium, platinum, potassium, rhodium, rubidium, ruthenium, silver, sodium, strontium, tantalum, tellurium, thallium, thorium, tin, titanium, tungsten, uranium, vanadium, yttrium, zinc, zirconium. Of these gold, silver, copper, tin, lead, zinc, platinum, iron, are the most malleable, gold, which possesses the quality in the greatest degree, being capable of being beaten into leaves $\frac{1}{1000}$ of a millimetre in thickness. The following, given in the order of their ductility, are the most ductile:—platinum, silver, iron, copper, gold, aluminium, zinc, tin, lead, platinum wire having been obtained of not more than $\frac{1}{1000}$ of a millimetre in diameter. The majority of the useful metals are between seven and eight times heavier than an equal bulk of water; platinum, osmium, and iridium are more than twenty times heavier; while lithium, potassium, and sodium are lighter. The metals become liquid, or otherwise change their condition, at very various temperatures: platinum is hardly fusible at the highest temperature of a furnace; iron melts at a little lower temperature; and silver somewhat lower still; while potassium melts below the boiling-point of water, and becomes vapour at a red heat, and it and sodium may be moulded like wax at 16° C. (61° Fahr.). Mercury is liquid at ordinary temperatures, and freezes only at 39° C. below zero (–38° Fahr.). Arsenic volatilizes without liquefying by heat, and is by some considered not to be a metal. Osmium and tellurium are also regarded by some as non-metals. All the metals, without exception, combine with oxygen, sulphur, and chlorine, forming oxides, sulphides, and chlorides, and many of them combine with bromine, iodine, and fluorine. Several of the later discovered metals exist in exceedingly minute quantities, and were detected only by spectrum analysis, and there is every likelihood that research in this direction will add to the present list of metals.—2. The name given by workers in glass, pottery, &c., to the material on which they operate when in a state of fusion. 3. pl. The rails of a railway.—4.† Courage; spirit; mettle.

Being glad to find their companions had so much mettal, after a long debate the major part carried it. Clarendon.

5. Material; substance; constituents.—6. The effective power of the guns carried by a ship of war; hence, fighting power; power of engaging in a controversy or the like. See under HEAVY.—7. Stones broken small, used in forming the surface of roads; ballasting.—8.† A mine. Jer. Taylor.

Metal (met'al), v. t. pret. & pp. metalled; ppr. metalling. To put metal on; to cover, as roads, with broken stones or metal.

Metal-broker (met'al-brōk-er), n. One who trades or deals in metals.

Metal-casting (met'al-kast-ing), n. The act or process of producing casts in metal by pouring it when in a state of fusion into a mould.

Metaldehyde (me-tal'dē-hīd), n. [Prefix meta, and aldehyde (which see).] A substance into which aldehyde is partially converted when kept at the ordinary temperature. It forms long, hard, four-sided prisms.

Metalleipsis (met-a-lep'sis), n. [Gr. metaleipsis, participation—meta, with, and lambanō, to take.] Participation; assumption; alternation; in rhet. the continuation of a trope in one word through a succession of significations, or the union of two or more tropes of a different kind in one word, so that several gradations or intervening senses come between the word expressed and the thing intended by it; as, 'In one Caesar there are many Mariuses.' Here Marius, by a synecdoche or antonomasia, is put for any ambitious, turbulent man, and this, by a metonymy of the cause, for the ill effects of such a temper to the public.

Metallepsy (met'a-lep-si), n. [See METALLEPSIS.] In chem. change or variation of a series of compounds under a type, by substitutions of different elements or substances for an equivalent in the type, as when a substance contains hydrogen, and, when subjected to change, takes up an equivalent for each atom of hydrogen it loses.

Metaleptic, Metaleptical (met-a-lep'tik, met-a-lep'tik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to a metalepsis or participation; transitive.—2. Transverse; as, the metaleptic motion of a muscle.—3. In chem. pertaining to, resulting from, or characterized by metalepsy, or the substitution of one substance for another which has been displaced.

Metaleptically (met-a-lep'tik-al-ī), adv. In a metaleptic manner; by transposition.

The name of promises may metaleptically be extended to combinations. Bp. Sanderson.

Metalled† (met'al-d), a. Mettled; sprightly; full of fire or ardour.

Such a light and metall'd dance
Saw you never. B. Jonson.

Metallic (me-tal'ik), a. [L. metallicus, from metallum, a metal.] Pertaining to a metal or metals; consisting of or containing metal; partaking of the nature of metals; like a metal; as, a metallic substance; metallic ore; metallic brightness.—Metallic lustre. See LUSTRE.—Metallic oxide, a compound of metal and oxygen.—Metallic paper, paper the surface of which is washed over with a solution of whiting, lime, and size. Writing done with a pewter pencil upon paper prepared in this manner is almost indelible.—Metallic salts, those salts which have a metallic oxide for their base, as carbonate of lead.

Metallical (me-tal'ik-al), a. Same as Metallic. [Rare and obsolete.]

Metallicature (me-tal'li-fak'tūr), n. [L. metallum, metal, and facio, facium, to make.] The manufacture of metals. [Rare.]

Metalliciferous (met-al-if'er-us), a. [L. metallum, metal, and fero, to produce.] Producing metal; yielding metal; as, metalliciferous deposits; metalliciferous districts; metalliciferous veins, &c.

Metalliciform (me-tal'i-form), a. [L. metallum, a metal, and forma, shape.] Having the form of metal; like metal.

Metalline (met'al-in), a. Pertaining to a metal; consisting of or containing metal; as, metaline water.

Metalling (met'al-ing), n. 1. The act of using metal for roads or railways.—2. The material, chiefly broken stones, so used.

Metallist (met'al-ist), n. A worker in metals, or one skilled in metals.

ch, chain; ch, Sc. loch; g, go; j, job;

n, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

Metallization (met'al-iz-ā'shon), n. The act or process of metallizing or forming into a metal; the operation which gives to a substance its proper metallic properties.

Metallize (met'al-iz), v.t. pret. & pp. metallized; ppr. metallizing. To form into metal; to give its proper metallic properties to.

Metallochrome (me-tal'lo-krom), n. [Gr. metallon, a mine, metal, and chrōma, colour.] A beautiful prismatic tint produced on polished steel plates on which a thin film of oxide of lead has been deposited by electrolytic action.

Metallochromy (met-al-lok'ro-mi), n. [See METALLOCHROME.] The art or process of colouring metals.

Metallographist (met-al-o-gr'a-fist), n. A writer on metallography or the subject of metals.

Metallography (met-al-o-gr'a-fi), n. [Gr. metallon, metal, and graphō, to describe.] An account of metals, or a treatise on metallic substances; the science of metals.

Metalloid (met'al-oid), n. [Gr. metallon, metal, and eidōs, resemblance.] In chem. a term which has been variously applied, as (a) to the metallic bases of the fixed alkalis and alkaline earths, probably in consequence of their low specific gravity; and (b) to all the non-metallic elementary substances. In the latter sense it is now used by chemists. The metalloids are thirteen in number: oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, carbon, chlorine, bromine, iodine, fluorine, sulphur, selenium, phosphorus, boron, and silicon. The distinction between a metal and a metalloid is, however, purely artificial, being based on physical rather than chemical criteria; but, broadly, a metal may be said to differ from a metalloid in being an excellent conductor of heat and electricity, in reflecting light powerfully, and in being electro-positive. Though a metalloid may possess one or more of these characters, it will not be found to unite them all. Berzelius, in his classification, restricts the term metalloid to the inflammable non-metallic elements: viz. sulphur, phosphorus, carbon, boron. See Elementary Substances under ELEMENTARY; see also METAL.

Metalloid (met'al-oid), a. Relating to metalloids; like metal; having the form or appearance of a metal.

Metalloidal (met-al-oid'al), a. Same as Metalloid.

Metallurgy (met-al-er'jik), a. Pertaining to metallurgy or the art of working metals. —Metallurgical chemistry, that part of chemistry which teaches the combinations and analyses of metals.

Metallurgical (met-al-er'jik-al), a. Same as Metallurgy.

Metallurgist (met'al-er-jist), n. One whose occupation is to work metals, or to purify, refine, and prepare metals for use.

Metallurgy (met'al-er-ji), n. [Gr. metallon, metal, and ergon, work.] The art of working metals, comprehending the whole process of separating them from other matters in the ore, smelting, refining, &c. In a more limited and usual sense, metallurgy is the operation of separating metals from their ores.

Metalsman (met'al-man), n. A worker in metals; a coppersmith or tinsman.
A smith, or a metalsman, the pot's never from his nose. Burton.

Metamere (met'a-mēr), n. [Gr. meta, with or among, and meros, a part.] In compar. anat. one of a series of similar parts.

Metameric (met-a-mer'ik), a. In chem. pertaining to or characterized by metamorphism; as, aldehyde (C₂H₄O) and oxide of ethylene (C₂H₂O) are metameric.

Metamerism (me-tam'er-izm), n. [Gr. prefix meta, denoting interchange, and meros, a part.] In chem. the character in certain compound bodies, differing in chemical properties, of having the same chemical elements combined in the same proportion and with the same molecular weight; thus, aldehyde (C₂H₄O) and oxide of ethylene (C₂H₂O) have their elements in the same proportion and the same molecular weight, 44. Metameric bodies do not, however, belong to the same class or series of compounds. See ISOMERISM, POLYMERISM.

Metamorphic (met-a-mor'fik), a. [See METAMORPHOSIS.] Producing metamorphosis; changing the form or structure; transforming; as, metamorphic cause or agency; metamorphic action. —Metamorphic rocks, in geol. (a) stratified rocks of any age whose texture has been rendered less or more crystalline by subterranean heat, pressure, or chemical agency. More specifically, (b) the lowest and azoic, or non-fossiliferous, stratified rocks, consisting of crystalline schists, and embracing granitoid schist, gneiss, quartz-rock, mica-schist, and clay-slate, all of which were originally deposited from water and crystallized by subsequent agencies. They exhibit for the most part cleavage, crumpling, and foliation, and their lines of stratification are often indistinct or obliterated. Although no traces of fossils have been discovered in these rocks, unless plumbago or graphite, a changed form of carbonaceous matter, and the so called Eozoön canadense, be regarded as fossil, there is no reason to conclude that these rocks, when deposited, did not contain animal or vegetable organisms, the traces of which may have been obliterated by the agency which produced the metamorphosis.

In geological nomenclature, the crystalline stratified rocks—gneiss, mica-schist, clay-slate, &c.—are termed Metamorphic, and erected into a separate system. Strictly speaking, 'metamorphic' applies to the power or force causing the change; 'metamorphism,' the process; and 'metamorphosis,' the result. Hence we ought to speak of metamorphic agency, and metamorphosed rocks. Page.

Metamorphism (met-a-mor'fiz), n. 1. The process of metamorphosing, or changing the form or structure. —2. The state or quality of being metamorphic; the change undergone by stratified rocks under the influence of heat, chemical agents, mechanical agents, as pressure. It is divided into two kinds—Metapexis and paroptesis (which see).

Metamorphist (met-a-mor'fist), n. One of a sect of sacramentarians of the fifteenth century, who affirm that the body with which Christ rose to heaven was wholly deified, having lost all its humanity.

Metamorphize (met-a-mor'fiz), v.t. To transform; to metamorphose. De Quincey.

Metamorphose (met-a-mor'fōs), v.t. pret. & pp. metamorphosed; ppr. metamorphosing. [Fr. metamorphoser, from metamorphosis (which see).] To change into a different form; to change the shape or character of; to transform; to transmute. 'And earth was metamorphosed into man.' Dryden.

Thou, Julia, thou hast metamorphosed me. Shak.

Metamorphose (met-a-mor'fōs), n. A transformation; metamorphosis. [Rare.]

Metamorphoser (met-a-mor'fōs-ēr), n. One that transforms or changes the shape.

Metamorphosis (met-a-mor'fōs-ik), a. Changing the form; transforming. 'The metamorphic fables of the ancients.' T. Pownall.

Metamorphosis (met-a-mor'fōs-is), n. [Gr. metamorphōsis, from metamorphōō, to transform—meta, denoting change, and morphē, form, shape.] 1. The result of metamorphic action; any change of form, shape, or structure; transformation. —2. A marked change in the form or function of a living body; a transformation resulting from development; specifically, in zool. the alterations which an animal undergoes after its exclusion from the egg, and which alter extensively the general form and life of the individual. All the changes which are undergone by a butterfly in passing from the fecundated ovum to the imago, or perfect insect, constitute its development—each change, from ovum to larva, from larva to pupa, and from pupa to imago, constituting a metamorphosis. The preliminary or embryonic changes undergone within the egg, and which eventuate in its giving birth to a larva or caterpillar, are, by way of distinction, sometimes comprised under the term transformation. —metamorphosis of organs, in bot. the adaptation of one and the same organ to several different purposes, connected with which are changes in size, colour, and other particulars. Thus, all the parts of a plant are reducible to the axis and its appendages, the other parts developing themselves from these progressively. See MORPHOLOGY. —3. In chem. a term employed by Liebig to denote that chemical action by which a given compound is caused, by the presence of a peculiar substance, to resolve itself into two or more compounds, as sugar, by the presence of yeast, into alcohol and carbonic acid.

Metamorphostical (met-a-mor'fōs'ti-kal), a. Pertaining to or effected by metamorphosis. Page.

Metapexis (met-a-pep'sis), n. [Gr. meta, over, beyond, and pepōō, to boil.] In geol.

that kind of metamorphism affecting large tracts and appearing to be chiefly due to wet heat, that is, to boiling water or steam under high pressure.

The great mass of Galway granite was produced out of Cambro-Silurian rocks by intense metapexis. Kinahen.

Metaphor (met'a-fēr), n. [Gr. metaphora, from metapherō, to transfer—meta, over, and pherō, to carry.] A figure of speech founded on the resemblance which one object is supposed to bear, in some respect, to another, and by which a word is transferred from an object to which it properly belongs to another in such a manner that a comparison is implied, though not formally expressed; a simile without any word expressing comparison; a short simile. Thus, 'that man is a fox,' is a metaphor; but 'that man is like a fox,' is a simile or comparison. In metaphor the similitude is contained in the name; a man is a fox, means, a man is as crafty as a fox. So we say, a man bridles his anger, that is, restrains it as a bridle restrains a horse; beauty awakens love or tender passions; opposition fires courage.—Simile, Metaphor, Allegory, Parable. See under SIMILE.

Metaphoric, Metaphorical (met-a-for'ik, met-a-for'ik-al), a. Pertaining to metaphor; comprising a metaphor; not literal; as, a metaphorical use of words; a metaphorical expression.

The expression 'applying capital' is, of course, metaphorical: what is really applied is labour; capital being an indispensable condition. F. S. Mill.

Metaphorically (met-a-for'ik-al-i), adv. In a metaphorical manner; not literally.

Metaphoricalness (met-a-for'ik-al-nes), n. The state or quality of being metaphorical.

Metaphorist (met'a-fēr-ist), n. One that makes metaphors.

Let the poet send to the metaphorist for his allegories. Arbutnot and Pope.

Metaphosphate (met-a-fos'fat), n. [Prefix meta, and phosphate.] A salt formed by the union of metaphosphoric acid with a base.

Metaphosphoric (met-a-fos-for'ik), a. [Prefix meta, and phosphoric.] Pertaining to, produced from, or resembling phosphorus or phosphoric acid.—Metaphosphoric acid, a dry flaky acid obtained by burning phosphorus under a bell-glass filled with air or oxygen; protohydrated phosphoric acid (H₂O, P₂O₅).

Metaphrase, Metaphrasis (met'a-frāz, me-ta'fra-zis), n. [Gr. metaphrasis—meta, over, according to or with, and phrasis, phrase.] 1. A verbal translation; a version or translation of one language into another, word for word. It stands opposed to paraphrase.

The translation is not so loose as paraphrase, nor so close as metaphrase. Dryden.

2. A phrase replying to another; a repartee.

I'm somewhat dull, still, in the manly art Of phrase and metaphrase. E. B. Browning.

Metaphrast (met'a-frast), n. A person who translates from one language into another, word for word.

Metaphrastic, Metaphrastical (met-a-fras'tik, met-a-fras'tik-al), a. Close or literal in translation.

Metaphrenon (met-a-frē'nōn), n. [Gr. meta, behind, and phrēn, the midriff.] In anat. the posterior part of the trunk, extending from the inferior and posterior part of the neck as far as the loins.

Metaphysic, Metaphysical (met-a-fiz'ik, met-a-fiz'ik-al), a. [See METAPHYSICS.] 1. Pertaining or relating to metaphysics; abstract; general; existing only in thought, and not in reality.

He knew what's what, and that's as high As metaphysic wit can fly. Hudibras.

According to some acceptations of the word metaphysical, which seem to make it synonymous with transcendental, and referable solely to the operations of pure reason, to the rejection of whatever is founded in experiment, none of Hume's works are properly metaphysical; and by the very foundation he has given to his philosophy he has made it empirical, and consequently not metaphysical. The word metaphysical is, however, here used in its ordinary, and, as it may be termed, popular acceptation, and as applicable to any attempt to analyze mind or describe its elements—a subject in relation to which the word ontology is also sometimes used. F. H. Burton.

2. According to rules or principles of metaphysics; as, metaphysical reasoning.

Of the whole movement of metaphysical science we have already pointed out Bacon and Descartes as the founders. F. D. Morell.

3. † Preternatural or supernatural.

Which fate and metaphysical aid doth seem To have thee crowned withal. Shak.

Fâte, fâr, fat, fâll; mē, met, hēr; pine, pin; nôte, not, môve; tûbe, tub, buill;

oil, pound; ù, Sc. abune; ý, Sc. fey.

Metaphysic (met-a-fiz'ik), n. Metaphysics.

Philosophy, that lean'd on heaven before,
Shrinks to her second cause; and is no more;
Phyic of metaphysic begs defence,
And metaphysic calls for aid, on sense. Pope.

Metaphysically (met-a-fiz'ik-al-lī), adv. In a metaphysical manner.

Metaphysician (met-a-fi-z'i-shan), n. One who is versed in the science of metaphysics.

Metaphysico-theological (met-a-fiz'i-kō-thē-ō-lō'ik-al), a. Embracing metaphysics and theology.

Metaphysics (met-a-fiz'iks), n. [Gr. meta, after, and physica, physics, from physis, nature. It is said that this name was given to the science by Aristotle or his followers, who considered the science of natural bodies or physics the first in the order of studies, and the science of mind or intelligence to be the second.] A word first applied to a certain group of the philosophical dissertations of Aristotle which were placed in a collection of his manuscripts after his treatise on physics. As since employed, it has had various significations. It was appropriated to the ontology and pneumatology of the schoolmen, but latterly it has been understood as applying to all inquiries which seek to trace the branches of human knowledge to their first principles in the constitution of our nature. In the part of the Aristotelian treatise alluded to the problems were concerned with the contemplation of being as being, and the attributes which belong to it as such. This implies that things in general must be divided into beings or things as they are, and into phenomena or things as they appear. In modern usage metaphysics is very frequently held as applying to the former division, that is to the ultimate grounds of being. To attain this end it takes into account the correlative of being, that is, knowledge; and of knowledge not as coming within the province of logic or of mental philosophy, but as it is in relation to being or objective reality. In this respect metaphysics is synonymous with ontology. The science has also been considered as synonymous with psychology, or the second division, and to denote that branch of philosophy which investigates the faculties, operations, and laws of the human mind. Regarding the science in its most general sense, Mansel proposes the following definition: 'Metaphysics, or the philosophy of the facts of consciousness considered subjectively in relation to the mind knowing, and objectively in relation to the things known,' and thus dividing itself naturally into the two branches of psychology and ontology. On the other hand, Ferrier in his Institutes of Metaphysics occupies himself solely with the questions connected with knowledge, or the nature of our perception of an external world.

He (Descartes) established the fundamental principle, which we regard as the corner-stone of all the metaphysics of modern Europe, namely, that as natural science is based upon inductions drawn from the actual observation of the world without, so metaphysical science is based upon inductions similarly drawn from reflection upon the world within.

Metaphysis (me-taf'i-sis), n. [Gr. meta, and physis, nature.] Change of form; transformation; metamorphosis.

Metaplasma (met-a-plaz-ma), n. [Gr. metaplasmos, to transform—meta, over, and plasseō, to form.] In gram. a change or transmutation in a word by adding, transposing, or retrenching a syllable or letter.

Metaplast (met-a-plast), n. In gram. a word or the stem of a word exhibiting the change of metaplasma.

Metapodium (met-a-pō'di-um), n. [Gr. meta, after, and pous, podos, a foot.] In zool. the posterior lobe of the foot in mollusca, often called the operculigenous lobe, because it develops the operculum when this structure is present.

Metapophysis (met-a-pof'i-sis), n. [Gr. meta, after, and apophysis, a process.] In anat. an exogenous process of the vertebra. These processes are very largely developed in the armadillo, assisting in the support of its carapace or defensive covering.

Metaptosis (met-ap-tō'sis), n. [Gr. meta, denoting change, and ptōsis, a falling.] In pathol. any change in a disease in regard to its nature or seat; transformation.

Metasome, Metasoma (met-a-sōm, met-a-sō-ma), n. [Gr. meta, after, and sōma, the body.] In compar. anat. the posterior portion of the body of a cephalopod, consisting of a soft membranous mass enveloped by the mantle and containing the viscera.

Metastasis (me-tas'ta-sis), n. [Gr. metastasis—meta, over, and stasis, a placing, state, position, from histēmi, to stand, to make to stand.] In pathol. a translation or removal of a disease from one part to another; any change in the former seat of a disease; also the change that takes place when the menstrual flow appears from other organs.

Metastatic (met-a-stat'ik), a. Relating to metastasis.

Metastoma (met-a-stō-ma), n. [Gr. meta, after, and stoma, the mouth.] The plate which closes the mouth posteriorly in the Crustacea.

Metatarsal (met-a-tār'sal), a. [From metatarsus.] Belonging to the metatarsus; as, a metatarsal bone.

Metatarsus (met-a-tār'sus), n. [Gr. meta, beyond, and tarsos, tarsus.] The middle of the foot, or part between the ankle and the toes; the bones coming between the tarsus and the digits in the hind foot of the higher vertebrates. See Foot.

Metathesis (me-tath'e-sis), n. [Gr. metathesis—meta, over, and tithēmi, to set.] 1. In gram. transposition, more especially of the letters, sounds, or syllables of a word, as in the case of A. Sax. ascian, ascian=E. az, ask; A. Sax. bird or brid=E. bird.—2. In med. a change in place of a morbid substance; an operation removing a morbid agent from one part to another, as in couching for cataract.

Metathetic, Metathetical (met-a-thet'ik, met-a-thet'ik-al), a. Relating to or containing metathesis.

Metathorax (met-a-thō'raks), n. [Gr. meta, beyond, and thōrax, the chest.] In entom. the third and last segment of the thorax, the second being called mesothorax.

Metatome (met-a-tōm), n. [Gr. meta, beyond, after, and tomē, and tomē, a cutting, from temnō, to cut.] In arch. the space between two dentils.

Metayer (me-tā'yer), n. [Fr. metayer, L.L. medietarius, from L. medietus, state of being in the middle, half, from medius, middle, also half.] A cultivator who tills the soil for a landholder on condition of receiving a share, generally a half of its produce, the owner furnishing the whole or part of the stock, tools, &c.

Vast estates accumulated by one proprietor, and cultivated by slaves, or at best by poor metayers. Milman.

The word is often used in the phrase metayer system, applied to that mode of land cultivation, practised chiefly in France and Italy, in which the land is cultivated by metayers.

The principle of the metayer system is that the labourer or peasant makes his engagement with the landowner, and pays, not a fixed rent, either in money or in kind, but a certain proportion of the produce, or rather what remains of the produce, after deducting what is considered necessary to keep up the stock. The proportion is usually, as the name imports, one-half; but in several districts in Italy it is two-thirds. Respecting the supply of stock, the custom varies from place to place; in some places the landlord furnishes the whole, in others half, in others some particular part, as for instance the cattle and seed, the labourer providing the implements. S. S. Mill.

Metazoa (met-a-zō'a), n. pl. [Gr. meta, after, and zōon, a living being.] One of the two great sections into which Huxley divides the animal kingdom, the other being the Protozoa. The Metazoa are distinguished from the Protozoa in that the substance of the body is differentiated into histogenetic elements, that is to say, into cells. In all the Metazoa the germ has the form of a nucleated cell, the first step in the process of development being the production of a blastoderm by the subdivision of that cell, the cells of the blastoderm giving rise in turn to the histological elements of the adult body. With the exception of certain parasites, and the extremely modified males of a few species, all these animals possess a permanent alimentary cavity, lined by a special layer of cells. Sexual reproduction always occurs, and very generally the male element has the form of filiform spermatozoa. The lowest term in the series of the Metazoa is represented by the Porifera or sponges. That portion of the Metazoa which possesses a notochord, and in the adult state have the trunk divided into segments or myotomes, constitute the sub-kingdom Vertebrata: the rest are invertebrate.

Mete (mēt), v.t. pret. and pp. meted; ppr.

meting. [A. Sax. metan, D. meten, Goth. mītan, G. messen, to measure; Icel. meta, to value; from a root seen also in L. modus, a measure (whence E. mode), moderate, to moderate, metior, to measure; Gr. metron, a measure; Skr. mā, to measure.] 1. To measure, to ascertain the quantity, dimensions, or capacity of by any rule or standard.

Shall as a pattern or a measure live
By which his grace must mete the lives of others. Shak.

Hence—2. To measure with the eye; to aim.

Let the mark have a prick in't to mete at. Shak.

3. To be the exact measure or equivalent of; to represent exactly; to accurately define or express. [Poetical.]

Alas, met alas,
Who have undone myself from all that best,
Fairest and sweetest, to this wretcheded,
Saddest and most defiled—cast out, cast down—
What word metes absolute loss? E. B. Browning.

Mete (mēt), n. [A. Sax. met, met, metto, Icel. mjót, O.H.G. mez, G. mass, a measure, with which may be incorporated O. Fr. mette, a boundary mark, from L. meta, a goal.] Measure; limit; boundary: used chiefly in the plural in the phrase metes and bounds.

Mete, † a. [See MEET.] Meet; fitting; convenient. Chaucer.

Mete, † n. Meat.—During the metes space, during the time of eating. Chaucer.

Mete, † v.t. or i. To meet. Chaucer.

Mete-borde, † n. An eating-table. Chaucer.

Metecorn (mēt'korn), n. [See METE.] A measure or portion of corn given by a lord to customary tenants as a reward and encouragement for labour and faithful service.

Metegavel (mēt'gā-vel), n. [O.E. met, food, and gavel, a tax.] A tribute or rent paid in victuals.

Metely, † a. Proportionable. 'Metely mouth.' Chaucer.

Metempiric, Metempiricist (met-em-pir'ik, met-em-pir'i-sist), n. One who believes in the metempirical or transcendental philosophy.

Metempirical (met-em-pir'ik-al), a. [Gr. meta, beyond, and empeiria, experience, from en, in, and peira, trial experiment.] In metaph. beyond or outside of experience; not based on experience; transcendental; a priori: opposed to empirical or experimental.

The exclusion of all metempirical questions, the rejection of the metempirical method, is the cardinal position of the Positive Philosophy. G. H. Lewes.

Metempiricism (met-em-pir'i-sizm), n. In metaph. the system of philosophy based on a priori reasoning; transcendentalism (which see).

Metempsychose (me-tem'si-kōz), v.t. [See METEMPYSCHOSIS.] To translate from one body to another, as the soul.

The souls of unware after their death Lucian affirms to be metempsychosed, or translated into the bodies of asses, and there remain certain years for poor men to take their pennyworth out of their bones. Peacham.

Metempsychosis (me-tem'si-kō'sis), n. [Gr. meta, denoting change, and empsychōō, to animate—en, in, and psychē, life, soul.] Transmigration; the passing of the soul of a man after death into some other animal body, a doctrine held by Pythagoras and his followers, and still prevailing in some parts of Asia, particularly in India.

The sages of old live again in us, and in opinions there is a metempsychosis. Glanville.

Metempsychosis (met-em-tō'sis), n. [Gr. meta, beyond, and empsychōō, a falling upon, from en, on, and psychōō, a falling, from piptō, to fall.] In chron. the solar equation necessary to prevent the new moon from happening a day too late, or the suppression of the bissextile once in 134 years. The opposite to this is the proempsychosis, or the addition of a day every 300 years and another every 2400 years.

Metensomatosis (me-ten'sō-ma-tō'sis), n. [Gr. the putting into another body—meta implying change, and ensomatōsis, an embodying or incarnation, from en, in, and sōma, sōmatos, the body.] The transference of the elements of one body into another body and their conversion into its substance, as by decomposition and assimilation. Metensomatosis is in some respects the analogue of metempsychosis. The latter word, however, implies no resolution into elements, and consequently no conversion.

Is it not indisputable that man's body . . . is composed of the very same materials, the same protein, and fats, and salines, and water, which constitute the inorganic world—which may unquestionably have served long ago as the dead material which was vivified and utilised in the bodies of extinct creatures, and which may serve in endless meteosomatia (if the word, which has the authority of Clemens Alexandrinus, and which is now imperiously demanded by the wants of science, may be pardoned on the score of necessity) for we know not what organisms yet to come? Farrar.

Meteor (mē'tēr), n. [Fr. météore, from Gr. metēōros, raised from the ground—meta, beyond, and eōra, aiōra, a thing suspended or hovering in the air, from aiēro, to lift, raise up.] 1. Any phenomenon or appearance of a transitory nature which has its origin in the atmosphere, as whirlwinds, hail, rain, snow, halos, the rainbow, &c. Now generally used in the specific sense of—2. A transient fiery or luminous body seen in the atmosphere or in a more elevated region; an aerolite; a shooting-star.

The imperial ensign; which, full high advanced, Shone like a meteor, streaming to the wind. Milton.

3. Fig. anything that transiently dazzles or strikes with wonder.

Meteoritic (mē'tēr-ik), a. 1. Pertaining to a meteor or meteors; having the nature of a meteor; consisting of meteors; as, meteoric stones; meteoric showers.—2. Fig. transiently or irregularly brilliant; flashing like a meteor.

Anthony Ashley Cooper, third earl of Shaftesbury (grandson of the first earl, the famous meteoric politician of the reign of Charles II.), was born in 1671 and died in 1713. Craik.

—Meteoritic iron, iron as found in meteoric stones, usually combined with from 1 to 10 per cent. of nickel.—Meteoritic stones, aerolites. See AEROLITE.—Meteoritic showers, showers of shooting-stars occurring periodically, and especially in the months of August and November. The maximum brilliancy occurs every thirty-three years, and then sometimes for four years in succession there are showers of unusual magnitude.

Meteorical (mē'tēr-ik-al), a. Same as Meteoritic.

Meteorism (mē'tēr-izm), n. In med. flatulent distension of the abdomen.

Meteorite (mē'tēr-it), n. A meteorolite.

Meteorize (mē'tēr-iz), v. i. To take the form of a meteor; to ascend in vapours.

To the end the dew may meteorize and emit their finer spirits. Evelyn.

Meteorographic (mē'tēr-ō-graf'ik), a. Pertaining to meteorography.

Meteorography (mē'tēr-ōg'ra-fi), n. [Gr. metēōron, a meteor, and graphē, description.] Meteorology; specifically, the registration of meteorological phenomena.

Meteorolite (mē'tēr-ol-it), n. [Gr. metēōros, high in air, and lithos, a stone.] A meteoric stone; a stone or solid compound of earthy and metallic matter which falls to the earth from space. Called also Aerolite. See AEROLITE.

Meteorologic, Meteorological (mē'tēr-ō-lōj'ik, mē'tēr-ō-lōj'ik-al), a. Pertaining to the atmosphere and its phenomena; relating to the science of meteorology.—Meteorological table or register, an account of the state of the air and its temperature, weight, dryness, or moisture, winds, &c., ascertained by the barometer, thermometer, hygrometer, anemometer, and other meteorological instruments.

Meteorologist (mē'tēr-ō-lō-jist), n. A person skilled in meteors; one who studies the phenomena of meteors or keeps a register of them.

Meteorology (mē'tēr-ō-lō-jī), n. [Gr. metēōrologia—(ta) metēōra, celestial phenomena, from metēōros, high in air, and logos, discourse. See METEOR.] The science which treats of atmospheric phenomena, more especially as connected with or in relation to weather and climate.

Meteoromancy (mē'tēr-ō-man-si), n. [Gr. metēōron, a meteor, and mantia, divination.] A species of divination by meteoric phenomena, chiefly by thunder and lightning, held in high estimation by the Romans.

Meteoroscope (mē'tēr-ō-skōp), n. [Gr. metēōron, a celestial body, and skopōō, to observe.] An instrument formerly in use for taking the apparent magnitude and the angular distances of heavenly bodies.

Meteoroscopy (mē'tēr-ōs'kō-pi), n. The taking of observations with the meteoroscope.

Meteorous (mē'tēr-us), a. Having the nature of a meteor.

The cherubim descended; on the ground Gliding meteorous, as evening mist Risen from a river. Milton.

Meter (mē'tēr), n. [From metē.] One who or that which measures: chiefly used in compounds, or with adjectives, as in coal-meter, land-meter, gas-meter, water-meter, hydraulic meter, but often separately in the sense of a gas-meter.

Meter (mē'tēr), n. Same as Metre.

Meterage (mē'tēr-āj), n. The act of measuring.

Meterer (mē'tēr-ēr), n. One who writes in metre; a poet. Drayton.

Metē-stick (mē'tēst'ik), n. Naut. A stick fixed on a board at right angles, to measure the height of the hold of a ship, and to level the ballast.

Metē-wand (mē'tēw'nd), n. A staff or rod of a certain length used as a measure.

The degree of his moral guilt is not the true index or metē-wand of his condemnation. Coleridge.

Metē-yard (mē'tēyard), n. A yard, staff, or rod used as a measure.

Give me thy metē-yard, and spare not me. Shak.

Metheglin (mē-theg'lin), n. [W. meddyglyn—medd, mead, and llyn, liquor.] A liquor made of honey and water boiled and fermented, often enriched with spices.

Methinks (mē-things'), v. impers. pp. methought. [A. Sax. me, dat. of first pers. pron., and the impersonal verb thyncean, to seem; to appear; comp. meeseems.] It seems to me; it appears to me; I think. [Chiefly used in poetry and elevated prose.]

By Heaven, methinks it were an easy leap, To pluck bright honour from the pale-fac'd moon. Shak.

See THINK, to seem.

Method (meth'od), n. [Fr. méthode; Gr. methodos—meta, after, and hodos, a way.] 1. A way or mode by which we proceed to the attainment of some aim; mode or manner of procedure: often used of a scientific or logical manner of procedure; as, there are two methods of accomplishing this, which method will you employ? there is a method proper to every department in philosophy.

For Bacon we claim the decided superiority in comprehensiveness of mind. He alone seemed to take in at one glance the whole circumference of human knowledge; he alone knew how to assign to each separate branch its proper position, to detect the prejudices by which it was impeded, and to furnish the true method by which advancement in every case was to be made. J. D. Morell.

2. (No pl.) (a) Logical or scientific arrangement or mode of procedure; the art of disposing well a series of many thoughts either for the discovering of truth when we are ignorant of it, or for proving it to others when it is already known. Fleming. (b) In ordinary language, systematic or orderly procedure; system; action regulated by rules; as, without method business of any kind will fall into confusion; to carry on farming to advantage, to keep accounts correctly, &c., method is indispensable.

Though this be madness, yet there's method in't. Shak.

3. In nat. hist. principle of classification; as, the method of Ray; the Linnæan method. SYN. Order, regularity, rule, mode, course, means, system.

Methodic (meth-od'ik), a. Same as Methodical.

Methodical (meth-od'ik-al), a. Characterized by or exhibiting method; possessing a systematic disposition or arrangement; systematic; orderly; as, the methodical arrangement of the parts of a discourse or of arguments; a methodical treatise; methodical accounts.

Methodically (meth-od'ik-al-ly), adv. In a methodical manner; according to natural or convenient order.

Methodics (meth-od'iks), n. The science of method; methodology.

Methodism (meth-od'izm), n. The doctrines and worship of the sect of Christians called Methodists.

Methodist (meth-od-ist), n. 1. One characterized by strict adherence to method; specifically, one of a sect of ancient physicians who practised by method or theory.

The opposite extreme was adopted by another sect, who, rejecting observation, founded their doctrine exclusively on reasoning and theory, and these called themselves al pedantes, or the methodists. Sir W. Hamilton.

2. A person who lives in the exact observance of religious duties: generally used in contempt or irony as a synonym for a sanctimonious person or a hypocrite.—3. One of a sect of Christians founded by John Wesley, so called from the fact that the name was applied to Wesley and his companions by their fellow-students at Oxford, on account of the exact regularity of their lives, and the strictness of their observance of religious duties.

Methodistic (meth-od-ist'ik), a. Same as Methodistical.

Methodistical (meth-od-ist'ik-al), a. Relating to method or the Methodists; resembling the Methodists; partaking of the strictness of Methodists; sometimes used ironically or contemptuously in the sense of Burns' unco guid.

Then spare our stage, ye methodistic men. Byron.

Methodistically (meth-od-ist'ik-al-ly), adv. In a methodistical manner.

Methodization (meth-od-iz-ā'shon), n. The act or process of methodizing or reducing to method; the state of being methodized.

The conceptions, then, which we employ for the colligation and methodization of facts, do not develop themselves from within, but are impressed upon the mind from without. J. S. Mill.

Methodize (meth-od-iz), v. t. pret. & pp. methodized; ppr. methodizing. To reduce to method; to dispose in due order; to arrange in a convenient manner.

One who brings with him any observations he has made in reading the poets, will find his own reflections methodized and explained in the works of a good critic. Spectator.

Methodizer (meth-od-iz-ēr), n. One who methodizes.

Methodology (meth-od-ol-o-jī), n. [Gr. methodos, method, and logos, discourse.] The science of method or of classification; a discourse concerning method.

Haller, whose reputation in physiology was as great as that of Linneus in methodology, rejected it as too merely artificial. W. Hewell.

Methought (mē-that'), pret. of methinks. It seemed to me; I thought.

Methought I saw my late espoused saint Brought to me, like Alceste, from the grave. Milton.

Methule (meth'ül), n. Same as Methyl.

Methyl (meth'il), n. [Gr. meta, after, with, and hylē, wood.] (CH_3 .) The name given to the hypothetical radical of wood spirit and its combinations. It is analogous to ethyl in its chemical characters.

Methylal (meth'il-al), n. ($\text{C}_2\text{H}_5\text{O}_2$.) A liquid product of the oxidation of methylic alcohol.

Methylamine (me-thil'a-min), n. (CH_5N .) A colourless gas having a strong ammoniacal odour, and resembling ammonia in many of its reactions. When brought in contact with a lighted taper it burns with a livid yellowish flame. Methylamine may be condensed to a liquid; it has not been solidified. It is exceedingly soluble in water.

Methylated (meth'il-ät-ed), a. Impregnated or mixed with methyl.—Methylated spirit, spirit of wine containing 10 per cent. of wood naphtha (methylic alcohol). The naphtha communicates a disagreeable flavour, which renders it unfit for drinking, and for this reason it is admitted duty free. It is of much use in the arts as a solvent, for preserving specimens, in manufacture of varnishes, for burning in spirit-lamps, &c.

Methylene (meth'il-ēn), n. [See METHYL.] (CH_2 .) A hypothetical hydro-carbon.

Methylic (me-thil'ik), a. Pertaining to or produced from methyl.—Methylic alcohol, alcohol obtained by the destructive distillation of wood.—Methylic ether ($(\text{CCH}_3)_2\text{O}$), oxide of methyl, a colourless gas.

Metē (mē'tik), n. [Gr. metēōikos, changing one's abode, emigrating and settling elsewhere—meta, denoting change, and oikos, a house, dwelling.] In ancient Greece, a sojourner; a resident stranger in a Grecian city or place.

Meticulous† (mē-tik'ü-lus), a. [L. meticulosus, from metus, fear.] Timid. 'Melancholy and meticulous heads.' Sir T. Browne.

Meticulously† (mē-tik'ü-lus-ly), adv. [See above.] Timidly. Sir T. Browne.

Métier (mā-tē-ā), n. [Fr.] Profession; speciality; rôle.

Metif (mē'tif), n. [Fr. metif, from a L.L. mixturus, from L. mixtus, pp. of miscere, to mix.] A half-breed between a white and a quarteroon.

Metis (mē'tis), n. [In Greek mythology the personification of prudence, the daughter of Oceanus and Thetys.] One of the small planets or asteroids, between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter, discovered by Mr. Graham, an Irish astronomer, April 25, 1848. It revolves round the sun in 1345.65 solar days, and is about two and a half times the distance of the earth from the sun.

Metochē (mē'tō-kē), n. [Gr. metochē, a sharing, from metechō, to share, to divide—meta, with, and echō, to have.] In arch. the interval between the dentils in the Ionic entablature.

Metoleic (me-tō-lē'ik), a. [Gr. meta, beyond, after, and E. oleic.] A name applied to an acid produced by the action of sulphuric acid on oleic acid. It is a liquid.

Metonic (mē-ton'ik), a. Pertaining to Meton, an ancient Athenian astronomer.—Metonic cycle, metonic year, the cycle of the moon, or period of nineteen years, in which the lunations of the moon return to the same days of the month: discovered by Meton.

Metonymic, Metonymical (met-ō-nim'ik, met-ō-nim'ik-al), a. [See METONYMY.] Pertaining to metonymy; used by way of metonymy.

Metonymically (met-ō-nim'ik-al-li), adv. By metonymy.

Metonymy (me-ton'ī-mi), n. [Gr. metonymia—meta, denoting change, and onoma, a name.] In rhet. a trope in which one word is put for another on account of some actual relation between the things signified; as when we substitute the effect for the cause, the author for his writings, the inventor for the thing invented, &c.; as when we say, 'We read Virgil,' that is, his poems or writings, 'They have Moses and the prophets,' that is, their books or writings. A man has a clear head, that is, understanding, intellect; a warm heart, that is, affections.

Metope (mē-tō-pē), n. [Gr. metopē—meta, with, between, and opē, an aperture or hollow.] In arch. the space between the triglyphs of the Doric frieze. See TRIGLYPHE.

Metoposopic, Metoposopical (mē-tō-pos-kop'ik, mē-tō-pos-kop'ik-al), a. Relating to metoposcopy.

Metoposcopist (mē-tō-pos'ko-pist), n. One versed in metoposcopy or physiognomy.

Metoposcopy (mē-tō-pos'ko-pi), n. [Gr. metōpos, the forehead, and skopeō, to view.] The study of physiognomy; the art of discovering the character or the dispositions of men by their features or the lines of the face.

Metra (mē'tra), n. [Lit. 'measures,' pl. of Gr. metron, a measure.] An ingenious pocket instrument, combining a thermometer, clinometer, goniometer, level, magnifying lens, measure for wire gauze, plummet, platina scales, anemometer, &c., by which the temperature, direction, and dip of rocks, the angles of cleavage and crystallization, the level of workings, the latitude, &c., can be determined.

Metre (mē'tēr), n. [Fr. mètre, L. metrum, Gr. metron, a measure. Akin mete (which see.)] Rhythmical arrangement of syllables into verses, stanzas, strophes, &c.; rhythm; measure; verse.

Rhyme being no necessary adjunct or true ornament of poem or good verse, in longer works especially, but the invention of a barbarous age to set off wretched matter and lame metre. Milton.

Metre, Mètre (mē'tēr; Fr. pron. mē-tr), n. A French measure of length, equal to 39.37 English inches, the standard of linear measure, being the ten millionth part of the distance from the equator to the North Pole, as ascertained by actual measurement of an arc of the meridian.

Metric (mē'trik), a. Same as Metrical. 'Hesiod with his metric fragments of rustic wisdom.' Prof. Blackie.

Metric (mē'trik), a. [Fr. métrique; L. metricus; Gr. metrikos, from metron, a measure.] Pertaining to the system of weights and measures first adopted in France, but gradually coming into use in other countries. It involves two important points: first, that the units of length, superficies, solidity, and weight are all correlated; and second, the multiplication or subdivision of the unit according to a uniform decimal notation. The multiples of the different units are indicated by prefixing Greek names of numbers to the name of the unit, the subdivisions by prefixing Latin names of numbers. These prefixes are, therefore, for decimal multiples, deca, hecto (or hect), kilo, and myrio; and for decimal subdivisions they are, deci, centi, and milli. Thus for linear measurement we have the mètre; its multiples, the décamètre (ten mètres), the hectomètre (one hundred mètres), the kilomètre (one thousand mètres), and the myriomètre (ten thousand mètres), and its subdivisions, the décimètre (one tenth of a mètre), the centimètre (one hundredth of a mètre), and the millimètre (one thousandth of a mètre). See METRE.

Metrical (mē'trik-al), a. [L. metricus; Fr. métrique.] 1. Pertaining to measuring; employed in measuring; as, the yard is the English metrical unit of length.—2. Pertaining to rhythm or measure.

Let any the best psalmist of them all compose a hymn in metrical form. Fer. Taylor.

3. Consisting of verse; composed in rhythmic form; as, metrical compositions. 'Metrical romances.' T. Warton.

Metrical (mē'trik-al-li), adv. In a metrical manner; according to poetic measure.

Metrician (mē'tri-shan), n. Same as Metrist.

Metricien, n. A writer in verse. Chaucer.

Metrifaction (mē'tri-fā'kshon), n. The act of making verses. Tennyson.

Metrist (mē'tri-fi-ēr), n. A metrist; a versifier.

Metrist (mē'trist), n. A composer of verses.

Metochrome (mē'trō-krom), n. [Gr. metron, a measure, and chroma, colour.] An instrument for measuring colours.

Metograph (mē'trō-graf), n. [Gr. metron, a measure, and graphō, to write.] An apparatus on a railway engine which measures and records the rate of speed at any moment, and the time of arrival and departure at each station.

Metrology (mē'trō-lō-jī), n. [Gr. metron, measure, and logos, discourse.] 1. An account of weights and measures.—2. The art and science of mensuration.

Metromania (mē'trō-mā'ni-a), n. [Gr. metron, a measure, and mania, madness.] An immoderate eagerness for writing verses.

Metronome (mē'trō-nōm), n. [Gr. metron, measure, and nomos, a law.] An instrument, consisting of a pendulum, set in motion by clock-work; invented and introduced in Austria about the year 1814, for the purpose of determining, by its vibrations, the movement, that is, the quickness or slowness, of musical compositions. There is a sliding weight attached to the pendulum rod, by the shifting of which up or down the vibrations may be made slower or quicker. A scale indicates the number of audible beats given per minute.

Maclzell's Metronome.

The dotted lines show the extent of vibration of the pendulum.

Metronomy (mē-tron'ō-mi), n. [See METRONOME.] The measuring of musical time by an instrument called the metronome.

Metronymic (mē'trō-nim'ik), n. and a. [Gr. metrōnymikos—mēter, mētros, a mother, and onoma, a name.] A term applied to a name derived from a mother or other near female ancestor, as opposed to patronymic.

Metropolis (mē'trō-pō-lis), n. [Gr. metropōlis—mēter, mētros, a mother, and polis, a city; it properly meant a mother-city, a city in relation to colonies it had sent out.] 1. The chief city or capital of a kingdom, state, or country, as Paris in France, Madrid in Spain, London in Great Britain.—2. The see or seat of a metropolitan bishop. 'Stood out against the holy church, the great metropolis and see of Rome.' Shak.

Metropolitan (mē'trō-pō-li-tan), a. 1. Belonging to a metropolis; residing in the chief city or capital of a country.—2. Eccles. having the authority of a metropolitan; proceeding from a metropolitan.

Metropolitan (mē'trō-pō-li-tan), n. 1. Originally, a bishop resident in a metropolis or the chief city of a province.

The precedence in each province was assigned to the bishop of the metropolis, who was called the first bishop, the metropolitan. Barrow.

2. Eccles. a bishop having authority over the other bishops of a province; an archbishop.

The archbishops of Canterbury and York are both metropolitans. Hook.

3. In the Greek Ch. the title of a dignitary intermediate between patriarchs and archbishops.

Metropolitanate (mē'trō-pō-li-tan-āt), n. The office or see of a metropolitan bishop.

As his wife she (Heloise) closed against him (Abelard) that ascending ladder of ecclesiastical honours, the priory, the abbacy, the bishopric, the metropolitanate, the cardinalate, and even that which was beyond and above all. Milman.

Metropolitanite (mē'trō-pō-li-t), n. A metropolitan.

Metropolit, Metropolitan (mē'trō-pō-li-tik, mē'trō-pō-li't'ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to a metropolis; metropolitan.—2. Eccles. pertaining to a metropolis. 'A metropolitan power over the whole island of Crete.' Abp. Sancroft.

Metroscope (mē'trō-skōp), n. [Gr. mētra, the uterus, and skopeō, to observe.] An instrument for listening to the sounds made by the heart of the fetus in the womb when they are imperceptible through the walls of the abdomen. Dunghison.

Metrosideros (mē'trō-si-dē'ros), n. [Gr.

Metrosideros vera (Iron-wood).

mētra, the heart of a tree, and sideros, iron.] A genus of climbing trees and shrubs, nat. order Myrtaceæ, for the most part natives of the islands of the Pacific. M. vera (true iron-wood) is a tree, a native of Java and Amboyna. Of the wood of this tree the Chinese and Japanese make rudders, anchors, &c., for their ships and boats. The bark is used in Japan as a remedy in dysentery, diarrhoea, and mucous discharges. M. polymorpha grows in the Sandwich Islands, and is said to be the plant from which are made the clubs and other weapons used in warfare by the South Sea Islanders. M. robusta is the rata of New Zealand, where it is employed in ship-building and in other ways. The trees of this genus have thick, opposite, entire leaves, and heads of showy red or white flowers.

Metrotome (mē'trō-tōm), n. [Gr. mētra, the womb, and tomos, a cutting, from temnō, to cut.] In surg. an instrument used to divide the neck of the uterus.

Metroxylon (mē'trōks'i-lon), n. [Gr. mētra, the heart of a tree, and xylos, wood.] A genus of plants, now known as Sagus. See SAGO.

Mette, † Mēt, † pret. of the obs. verb meten (A. Sax. metan), to dream. 'The lover mette he hath his lady wonne.' Chaucer. It is often used impersonally, me mette, signifying I dreamed.

Mettle (mēt'), n. [Merely an altered spelling of metal, which was formerly used in the same sense, though each has now distinctive applications of its own.] 1. Stuff; material; moral or physical constitution.

Every man living shall assuredly meet with an hour of temptation, a certain critical hour, which shall more especially try what mettle his heart is made of. South.

2. Disposition; character; temper; spirit; constitutional ardour; courage; sprightliness; fire. 'Gentlemen of brave mettle.' Shak. 'A lad of mettle.' Shak.

The winged courser, like a generous horse, Shows most true mettle when you check his course. Pope.

They were all knights of mettle true, Kinsmen to the bold Buccleuch. Sir W. Scott.

—To put a man on or to his mettle, to stimulate a man to do his uttermost; to put a man in a position where he must do his utmost.

ch, chain; ch, Sc. loch; g, go; j, job;

n, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

A man is generally put on his mettle from a spirit of rivalry.

It puts us to our mettle to see our old enemies the French taking the work with us. Lever.

Mettled (met'ld), a. Full of mettle; high-spirited; ardent; full of fire. 'Mettled steeds,' Addison.

Mettlesome (met'l-süm), a. Full of mettle or spirit; possessing constitutional ardour; brisk; fiery.

Their force differs from true spirit as much as a vicious from a mettlesome horse. Tatler.

Mettlesomely (met'l-süm-lī), adv. With mettle or sprightliness, or high spirit.

Mettlesomeness (met'l-süm-nes), n. The state of being mettlesome or high-spirited.

Metwand (met'wand), n. Same as Metewand.

Meum (mē'um), n. [Gr. meion, less—in allusion to the leaves.] A genus of plants of the nat. order Umbelliferae. The species are natives of the upland parts of Europe, having deeply divided leaves and white or purple flowers.

Meum (mē'um), [L.] Mine; that which is mine; commonly used in the phrase meum and tuum, meaning what belongs to one's self and what belongs to any one else.

Meute (müt), n. [L.L. mula, a mew. See MEW.] A mew for hawks.

The cloisters became the camps of their retainers, the stables of their coursers, the kennels of their hounds, the meutes of their hawks. Milman.

Mevable, t. a. Movable. Chaucer.

Meve (t' mēv), v. t. To move.

Mew (mū), n. [A. Sax. mæw, a gull or mew; cog. Sc. maw, D. meuw, G. meve, möve, Icel. már, a mew or sea-gull.] A sea-mew; a gull.

Mew (mū), n. [Fr. mue, a moulting, a changing the feathers, a mew or cage, from muer, to moul, and L.L. mūta, a mew, both from L. mutare, to change.] 1. A cage for hawks or other birds while mewing or moulting; also, a coop in which fowls were kept. 'Nests and perches, and meves.' Bp. Hall. Hence—2. An inclosure; a place of confinement in general. 'Forth coming from her darksome mew.' Spenser.—3. pl. A stable. See MEWS.

Mew (mū), v. t. [In meaning 1 from Fr. muer, to mew; in 2 from the noun.] 1. To shed or cast; to change; to moul; to mew; as, the hawk mewed his feathers.

He may spread his feathers for a time, but he will mew them soon after. Bacon.

2. To shut up; to inclose; to confine, as in a cage or other inclosure. 'More pity that the eagle should be mew'd.' Shak. 'Close mew'd in their sedans for fear of air.' Dryden.

Mew (mū), v. i. To cast the feathers; to moul; hence, to change; to put on a new appearance.

Mew (mū), v. i. [Imitative, and also written meaw, miaw, &c. Comp. W. meuian, G. miäuen, Sc. myaw, to mew.] To cry as a cat.

Thrice the brinded cat hath mewed. Shak.

Mew (mū), n. The cry of a cat.

I'd rather be a kitten, and cry mew, Than one of these same metre-ballad-mongers. Shak.

Mewe, t. a. Mew; a place of secrecy or concealment.—In mew, in secret. Chaucer.

Mewet, t. a. Mute.—In mewet, dumbly; speaking inwardly. Chaucer.

Mewl (mül), v. i. [Imitative; comp. mew, miawl, Fr. miäuler, Sc. myaul, to cry like a child.] To cry or squall, as a child.

At first the infant Mewling and puking in the nurse's arms. Shak.

Mewl (mül), n. The cry of a child.

Mewler (mül'ér), n. One that squalls or mewls.

Mews (müz), n. pl. [See MEW, a cage.] 1. The royal stables in London, so called because built where the king's hawks were once mewed or confined; hence, a place where carriage-horses are kept in large towns.—2. (Used as a sing.) A lane or alley in which stables or mews are situated; as, he lives up a mews.

Mr. Turveydrop's great room . . . was built into a mews at the back. Dickens.

Mexican (mek's'i-kan), n. A native or inhabitant of Mexico.

Mexican (mek's'i-kan), a. Of or belonging to Mexico or its inhabitants.—Mexican lily, Amayllis reginae, nat. order Amayllidaceae, a plant with beautiful scarlet flowers.—Mexican tiger-flower, Tigridia pavonina, nat. order Iridaceae, a plant with beautiful yellow or orange spotted flowers, cultivated in our gardens.

Meynt, t. pret. & pp. of minge. Mingled.

Till with his elder brother Themis His brackish waves he meint. Spenser.

Mezereon, Mezereum (me-zê-rê-on, me-zê-rê-um), n. [Fr. mézereon, Sp. mezereon, from Ar. and Per. mázariyân, the camellia.] A plant of the genus Daphne (D. Mezereum). See DAPHNE.

Mezzozoth (mez'û-zoth), n. The name given to certain pieces of parchment anciently attached to the door-post of a house. Weale.

Mezzanine (mez'za-nên), n. [Fr.; It. mezzanino, from mezzo, middle. See MEZZO.] In arch. (a) a story of small height introduced between two higher ones; an entresol. (b) A window less in height than breadth; a window in an entresol.

Mezzo (med'zô), a. [It., from L. medius, middle.] In music, middle; mean.—Mezzo voce, with a medium fullness of sound.—Mezzo soprano, a treble voice of medium range, lower than soprano and higher than contralto.

Mezzorilievo (med'zô-rê-lê'vô or met'zô-rê-lê-â'vô), n. [It. mezzorelievo.] Middle relief.

Mezzotint (med'zô-tint), n. Same as Mezzotinto.

Mezzotinter (med'zô-tint-ér), n. One who practises mezzotinto engraving.

Mezzotinto (med'zô-tint'ô), n. [It. mezzo, middle, half, and tinto, tint, from L. tinctus, painted.] A particular manner of engraving on copper or steel in imitation of painting in Indian ink, the lights and gradations being scraped and burnished out of a prepared dark ground. The surface of the plate is first completely covered with minute incisions, so that it would give in this condition a uniform black impression. The design is then drawn on the face, and the dents are erased from the parts where the lights of the piece are to be, the parts which are to represent shades being left untouched or partially scraped according to the depth of tone.

Mezzotinto (med'zô-tint'ô), v. t. To engrave in mezzotinto.

Mhorr (mör), n. Same as Mohr.

Mi (mē), n. The third note in the musical scale, between re and fa.

Miargyrite (mi-âr'ji-rîr), n. [Gr. meion, less, and argyros, silver, from its containing comparatively little silver.] In mineral, a mineral of an iron-black colour, and very sectile, consisting principally of sulphur, antimony, and silver.

Miaskite, Miascite (mi'ask-it), n. [From miask in Siberia, where it is found.] A granitic rock in which elastolite, the large crystalline form of nephelite, replaces quartz.

Miasm (mi'azm), n. Same as Miasma.

Miasma (mi-az'ma), n. pl. Miasmata (mi-as'ma-ta). [Gr. miasma, miasmatos, from miainô, to stain, to sully, to defile.] Infecting substances floating in the air; the effluvia or fine particles of any putrefying bodies, rising and floating in the atmosphere, and considered to be noxious to health; noxious emanation; malaria. Also in form maasm. 'Pestilential miasms.' Harvey.

The word miasm has, by some, been employed synonymously with contagion. It is now used more definitely for any emanation, either from the bodies of the sick, or from animal and vegetable substances, or from the earth, especially in marshy districts. Douglason.

Miasmal (mi-az'mal), a. Containing miasma; miasmatic.

Miasmatic, Miasmatical (mi-az-mat'ik, mi-az-mat'ik-al), a. Pertaining to miasma; partaking of the qualities of noxious effluvia.

Miasmaticist (mi-az'ma-tist), n. One versed in the phenomena and nature of exhalations; one who understands the character and effects of miasma.

Miasmology (mi-az-mol'o-jī), n. [Gr. miasma, pollution, and logos, discourse.] A treatise on miasma; the science of miasma.

Miaul (myəl), v. i. [Imitative; comp. mew, mewl.] To cry as a cat or kitten; to mew.

I mind a squalling woman no more than a miawling kitten. Sir W. Scott.

Mica (mī'ka), n. [L. mico, to glitter.] A mineral of a foliated structure, consisting of thin flexible laminae or scales, having a shining and almost metallic lustre. These are sometimes parallel, sometimes interwoven, sometimes wavy or undulated, sometimes representing filaments. The laminae of mica are easily separated, and are sometimes not more than the 300,000th part of an inch in thickness.

The plates are sometimes as large as 18 inches diameter. They are employed in Russia for window panes, and in that state are called muscovy-glass. Mica enters into the composition of the crystalline rocks, as granite, gneiss, mica schists, chlorites, talcose rocks, and occurs in trappean and volcanic products. It is found also in many sedimentary rocks, as shales and sandstones, giving them their laminated texture. In the latter case, it is derived from the disintegration of the crystalline rocks. It is essentially a silicate of alumina, with which are variously combined small proportions of the silicates of potash, soda, lithia, oxide of iron, oxide of manganese, &c., in accordance with which several species have been constituted, as common or potash mica, lithia mica, magnesia mica, pearl mica. In the talcs, especially the softer and soapier varieties, the alumina is nearly entirely replaced by magnesia. Regarded as minerals, its varieties have received the names of biotite, lepidolite, muscovite, lepidomelane, steatite, &c.—Mica schist, mica slate, a metamorphic rock, composed of mica and quartz; it is highly fissile and passes by insensible gradations into clay-slate.

Micaceo-calcareous (mi-kā'shê-ô-kal-kā'rê-us), a. In geol. containing mica and lime; specifically, applied to a mica schist containing carbonate of lime.

Micaceous (mi-kā'shūs), a. Pertaining to or containing mica; resembling mica or partaking of its properties.—Micaceous iron ore, a variety of oxide of iron, occurring generally in amorphous masses composed of thin six-sided laminae.—Micaceous rocks, rocks of which mica is the chief ingredient, as mica slate and clay-slate.—Micaceous schist, mica schist (which see under MICA).

Mice (mis), n. pl. of mouse.

Mich. See MICHE.

Michael (mī'kêl), n. A St. Michael's orange; a fine kind of sweet orange brought from the island of St. Michael's, one of the Azores. Dickens.

Michaelite (mī'kêl-it), n. In mineral a white, pearly, fibrous variety of opal: so called from the island of St. Michael's, Azores, where it is found.

Michaelmas (mī'kêl-mas), n. [Michael, and mass, a feast.] 1. The feast of St. Michael, the archangel. It falls on the 29th of September, and is supposed to have been established towards the close of the fifth century. In England, Michaelmas is one of the regular terms for settling rents.—Michaelmas head court, in Scotland, the annual meeting of the freeholders and commissioners of supply of a county, held at Michaelmas for various county purposes.—2. Autumn. [Colloq.]—Michaelmas daisy, a name applied to various species of aster, which are common inhabitants of flower-borders, blooming about Michaelmas.

Miche, Mich (mich), v. i. [Probably from O. Fr. muchier, mucher, mucier, Fr. mauser, to hide, to skulk; of unknown origin. The word is used in the dialects in senses similar to those given below, as also mooch, mouch, which seem to be kindred forms.] 1. To lie hid; to skulk; to retire or shrink from view. 'Or miche in corners among their friends idly.' Spenser.

To miche, or secretly to hide himself out of the way, as truants do from school. Minsheu.

2. To be guilty of anything done in secret; as, to carry on an illicit amour, or to pilfer secretly. See MICHER.

Michelia (mi-kêl'i-a), n. [After Micheli, a Florentine botanist of the early part of the eighteenth century.] A genus of fine lofty trees natives of India and other parts of the East, nearly allied to the genus Magnolia. Several of the species yield useful timber as well as products used in medicine. For the M. Champaca, remarkable for the fragrance of its flowers, see CHAMPAC.

Micher (mich'ér), n. [See MICHE.] One who skulks, or creeps out of sight; a truant; a thief. [Obsolete or provincial.]

Shall the blessed sun of heaven prove a micher and eat blackberries? Shak.

What, turn micher, steal a wife, and not make your old friends acquainted with it. Old play.

Michery (mich'ér-i), n. Theft; cheating.

Miching (mich'ing), p. and a. Retiring; skulking; creeping from sight; mean; cowardly. Shak. [Obsolete or provincial.]

Mickle (mī'k), a. [A. Sax. micel, mycel, Icel. mikill, Goth. mikils, Sc. mickle, muckle.] An old and northern form corresponding to the later and southern much, michel. See MUCH.] Much; great.

○ michte is the powerful grace that lies
In plants, herbs, stones, and their true qualities.

Mico (mī'kō), n. [Native name.] A beautiful South American species of monkey, Jacchus argentatus, allied to the marmoset. The hair is of a shining white colour, the face and hands of a flesh colour, and the tail black.

Microbe (mī'krōb), n. [Gr. mikros, small, bios, life.] A name applied to many minute microscopic organisms whether of animal or vegetable character, and including those otherwise spoken of more distinctively as bacteria, bacilli, &c.

Microcephalous (mī'krō-sef'al-us), a. [Gr. micros, small, and kephalē, the head.] Having a small or imperfectly formed skull.

Microchronometer (mī'krō-kro-nom'et-ēr), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and E. chronometer.] An instrument for registering very small periods of time, such as the time that a projectile takes to pass over a short distance; a kind of chronograph. Called also Micronometer.

Microcosm (mī'krō-kōzm), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and kosmos, world.] 1. Lit. A little world or cosmos, a term that used to be often applied to man, as supposed to be an epitome of the universe or great world (the macrocosm).

If you see this in the map of my microcosm, follows it that I am known well enough too? Shak.

Philosophers say that man is a microcosm, or little world, resembling in miniature every part of the great; and the body natural may be compared to the body politic. Swift.

2. A little community or society.

And now the hour has come when this youth is to be launched into a world more vast than that in which he has hitherto sojourned, yet for which this microcosm has been no ill preparation. Disraeli.

Microcosmic, Microcosmical (mī'krō-kōz'mik, mī'krō-kōz'mīk-al), a. Pertaining to the microcosm or man. — Microcosmic salt, a triple salt of soda, ammonia, and phosphoric acid, originally obtained from human urine. It is much employed as a flux in experiments with the blowpipe.

Microcosmography (mī'krō-kōz-mog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. mikros, small, kosmos, world, and graphō, to write.] The description of man as a little world.

Microcoustic (mī'krō-kous'tik), a. [Gr. mikros, small, and akouē, to hear.] Serving to augment weak sounds; of or pertaining to an instrument for augmenting weak sounds.

Microcoustic (mī'krō-kous'tik), n. An instrument to augment small sounds, and assist in hearing.

Microdermatous (mī'krō-dēr'ma-tus), a. [Gr. mikros, small, and derma, the skin.] A term applied to certain minute cells, discovered in the scalp by aid of the microscope, in the disease porrigi favosa.

Microdon (mī'krō-don), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and odon, odontos, a tooth.] A genus of extinct fishes, belonging to the pycnodont or thick-toothed family.

Microgeological (mī'krō-jē-ō-jik'al), a. Pertaining to microgeology; dependent on, or derived from the use of the microscope in relation to geology; as, microgeological investigations.

Microgeology (mī'krō-jē-ō-jī), n. [First part of microscope, and geology.] That department of the science of geology whose facts are ascertained by the use of the microscope.

Micrograph (mī'krō-graf), n. Same as Micropantograph.

Micrographer (mī-krog'ra-fēr), n. One versed in micrography.

Micrographic (mī'krō-graf'ik), a. Connected with or relating to micrography.

The 'Micrographic Dictionary' was offered as an index to our knowledge of the structure and properties of bodies revealed by the microscope.

Griffith & Henfrey.

Micrography (mī-krog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and graphō, to describe.] The description of objects too small to be discerned without the aid of a microscope.

Microlestes (mī'krō-les-tēs), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and lēstēs, a robber.] A genus of extinct marsupials, containing the earliest known mammalian inhabitant of our planet. It occurs at the upper part of the upper trias. Only a few teeth have as yet been detected, and from these it appears to have been most nearly related to the little insectivorous Myrmecobius, or banded ant-eater of New South Wales.

Microlite (mī'krō-lit), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and lithos, a stone.] Another name for Pyrochlore, given to it on account of the small size of its crystals. See PYROCHLORE.

Microlithic (mī'krō-lith-ik), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and lithos, a stone.] Of or pertaining to, or consisting of, small stones: opposed to megalthic. 'Crypt-like chambers of microlithic masonry.' Fraser's Mag.

Micrology (mī'krō-lō-jī), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and logos, description.] 1. That part of science dependent on microscopic investigations; micrography. — 2. Undue attention to minute, unimportant matters. 'The micrology of the Pharisees.' W. Adams.

Micrometer (mī-krom'et-ēr), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and metron, a measure.] An instrument used with a telescope or microscope, for measuring very small distances, or the apparent diameters of objects which subtend very small angles. The measurement given directly is that of the image of the object formed at the focus of the object-glass. Micrometers are variously constructed; but in perhaps the most common form (the filar micrometer) the principle of operation is that the instrument moves a fine thread or wire parallel to itself in the plane of the image of an object, formed in the focus of the telescope, the wire or thread being moved by means of delicate screws with graduated heads, so that the distance traversed by the wire can be measured with the greatest precision. The micrometer is of the utmost value to the astronomer, and in trigonometrical surveys, military and naval operations. Besides the filar micrometer, there are various other kinds, as the circular or annular micrometer, the divided object-glass micrometer, &c. — Micrometer screw. See SCREW.

Micrometric, Micrometrical (mī'krō-met'rik, mī'krō-met'rik-al), a. Belonging to the micrometer; made by the micrometer; as, micrometric measurements.

Micrometrically (mī'krō-met'rik-al-li), adv. By means of a micrometer.

Micrometry (mī-krom'et-ri), n. The art of measuring small objects or distances with a micrometer.

Micronometer (mī'krō-nom'et-ēr), n. Same as Microchronometer.

Micropantograph (mī'krō-pan'tō-graf), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and E. pantograph.] An instrument constructed on the general principle of the pantograph for executing extremely minute writing and engraving. By means of this instrument the Lord's prayer has been written on glass within the space of $\frac{33}{1000000}$ th of an inch. Called also Micrograph.

Microphone (mī'krō-fōn), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and phōnē, sound.] An instrument to augment small sounds. The instrument invented for this purpose by Mr. Hughes in 1873 is based on the fact that substances possessing little electrical conductivity, when placed in the course of an electric current, have their conductivity much increased by the very smallest amount of pressure. The instrument has various forms, but in most of these one piece of charcoal is held loosely between two other pieces in such a manner as to be affected by the slightest vibrations conveyed to it by the air or by any other medium. The two external pieces are placed in connection with a telephone, and when one places one's ear at the ear-piece of the telephone the sounds caused by a fly walking on the wooden support of the microphone appear as loud as the tramp of a horse. By some arrangements the sounds of the human voice conveyed to a distance by the telephone can be made audible in every part of a hall.

Microphonics (mī'krō-fōn'iks), n. The science of augmenting small sounds.

Microphonous (mī'krō-fōn-us), a. [Gr. mikros, small, and phōnē, voice.] Serving to augment small or weak sounds; microcoustic.

Micropantography (mī'krō-fō-tog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and E. photography.] A photographic process by which an object is reproduced of microscopic size; or the photography of microscopic objects. This process was utilized practically in the siege of Paris in 1870, when communication with the capital was only possible by means of carrier-pigeons brought out by balloons and sent back with messages. Letters to Paris were by this means reduced to the minimum of space, and the transcript being taken on paper of extreme tenacity, a pigeon could convey a large number of communications. The writing could either be enlarged by photography or read by a microscope.

Microphthalmia, Microphthalmym (mī'krōf-thal'mi-a, mī'krōf-thal-mi), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and ophthalmos, the eye.] A morbid smallness of the eye.

Microphyllous (mī'krōfil-us), a. [Gr. mikros, small, and phyllon, a leaf.] In bot. having small leaves.

Microphyte (mī'krō-fit), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and phyton, a plant.] A microscopic plant, especially one parasitic in its habits.

From the upper leaf-bed I obtained some species of Desmidiæ—these microphytes being quite absent in the lower bed. J. A. Mahony.

Micropile (mī'krō-pil), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and pyle, gate.] The part of a seed that corresponds to the foramen of the ovule; in the seed it is nearly or quite closed.

Microrheometrical (mī'krō-rē-ō-met'rik-al), a. [Gr. mikros, small, rheō, to flow, and metron, a measure.] Pertaining to a method of determining the nature of bodies in solution when flowing through small or capillary tubes; as, the microrheometrical method.

Microscope (mī'krō-skōp), n. [Gr. mikros, small, and skopeō, to view.] An optical instrument consisting of a lens or combination of lenses (in some cases mirrors also) which magnifies objects, and thus renders visible minute objects that cannot be seen by the naked eye, or enlarges the apparent magnitude of small visible bodies, so as to enable us to examine their texture or structure. The single or simplest form of microscope is nothing more than a lens or sphere of any transparent substance, in the focus of which minute objects are placed. When a microscope consists of two or more lenses, one of which forms an enlarged image of objects, while the rest magnify that image, it is called a compound microscope. A binocular microscope is a microscope with two
